Eye of the Beholder

One of my nieces has entered a fairy-princess phase. She keeps a stash of costumes beneath her bed, and over the holidays we played dress-up. Like a mutant Tinkerbell, I squeezed through the sleeves of a purple gown and attached a set of shimmering wings. After placing a tiny tiara on my head, she slid an arm around my shoulder and whispered in my ear, "You look beautiful."

I looked ridiculous but admit to feeling lovely in that moment. There's something transformative about a crown, a phenomenon Jonathan Soroff explores this issue in his profile of an unlikely pageant contender. Competing on a dare, the contestant quickly went from a diet of beer and football to a diet of, well, nothing.

She never lost her sense of humor ("The higher the hair, the closer to God!"), a reminder that beauty should be fun. Cover gal Gretta Monahan, who owns several spas, has built her empire on that belief—and on the power of a good body scrub. In that spirit, we tested five treatments with purported health benefits, a nod to flu season.

Or you could just try a tiara. Works wonders.

PRACTICE, IT SEEMS, MAKES tara tendons. Having wrecked her feet as a dance instructor, Sarah Carr was working a desk job to pay for physical therapy when she turned to pilates. "I realized my training had been so one-dimensional, it left me open to injuries." Within a few years Carr, 31, was teaching a CardioFunk class at MIT, where she met Pai-Ling Yin, an assistant professor at the university's Sloan School of Management. "Last year we were training," Carr recalls, "and she said, 'I want to help you open your own studio.'" The result is Fit LAB, a pilates studio based on "current biomechanical knowledge" and the latest rehab science. Theory meets practice, without the face pain. ANDREW BLEMAN

Good Eats

Healthy Start

Here we go again: Every January dieters swear off all things delicious and resign themselves to a bleak month of egg-white omelets or the Special K Challenge. Fortunately, several local bakeries sell grab bags of healthy granola. Hi-Rise Bread Company's has good crunch, not to mention seeds, coconut shreds, wild honey and enough salt to keep the sweetness in check. Think of it as oatmeal cookies without the butter.

With cold season in full force, Bina Osteria offers its PEAR TODDY ($10), or Theraflu for champions. Bartender Christina Williams has twisted the typical toddy formula with ingredients like muddled Bartlett pears, clove syrup and rooibos tea. "I like the rooibos because it has orange accents, and I thought it would go with the pear," she explains, adding, "A lot of toddies have clove-spiked oranges, so I thought the syrup would provide a nice accent. And I thought the clove syrup was being underutilized anyway."

With a slug of applejack, the Pear Toddy packs a wallop. ("Yeah, 2 ounces of brandy will do that," Williams confirms.) It provides an assertive, boozy heat complementing the drink's temperature, and those two elements combine to create an aggressively relaxing beverage. It's what you'd want affixed to the St. Bernard who came to your rescue in the Alps, or as a nightcap on a blustery winter's eve. Whichever comes first.

Living in the moment

The Mindfulness Solution
by Ronald D. Siegel

Siegel is an assistant clinical professor of psychology at Harvard Medical School.

THIS IRREPLACEABLE MOMENT—and all moments are fleeting—might be a painful one. So maybe you'd rather zoom past it, wolfing it down like a bad-tasting meal. Understandable, but you'd miss its meaning. Mindfulness helps you appreciate both aspects of this paradox. Through the practice, you'll notice the pleasurable, all-too-brief dimensions of experience, while simultaneously exploring the variety and fluidity of negative things. "Having sadness in our lives," author Ronald D. Siegel writes, "doesn't just make it possible to recognize joy. It may make it possible to feel joy." Deny pain, and you "dampen" pleasure. Emotional and physical suffering have two "arrows"—the actual sensation and the anxiety we add—and they can be separated. Siegel offers slow-down and open-up exercises, beginning with that old pal, your breath, revealing the interconnectedness of pleasure and pain. He describes exercises with meditative themes: Think of yourself as an eternal mountain surrounded by the changing trees and seasons; this widens the landscape, and by inviting curiosity, transforms the bluntness of good and bad. Couples, in another exercise, can be mindful together, face to face, each imagining the other through the phases of life, from childhood to today and onto old age. "Be aware that your partner has had thousands of moments of joy and sorrow, fear and anger, longing and fulfillment—just like you." Walking meditation draws attention to the slowest of slow motion, the incredible fullness we have—if we notice it—each step along the way. ✖✖✖

In the context of classical composition, Symphony 8 exemplifies the ternary form. The first and third sections are harmonious, while the movement in the middle provides a playful contrast. There's both a consistency and variety that aims to please all tastes.

"We're right on the border of a wealthy neighborhood, so we needed a bistro," chef Josh Davis explains. "And we're right near Northeastern, so we needed a pub, and the owners were born in Ireland." In the spare, expansive dining room, symphony patrons can indulge in "tuxedo" halibut ($15) crusted with black and white sesame seeds. In the pub area, named Siánsa 8, the menu is similar, but napkins might be jauntily thrust into shirt collars in preparation for hog wings ($9)—braised and deep-fried pork shanks served over waffle fries. "After you have those, you won't need to eat again for a few days," Davis warns.

And then, in the middle, is the opening to Prohibited. The stairs to the Irish "spake-aisy"—which is ironically difficult to say—are hidden behind a sliding bookcase. Those who seek entry must have the password. As the password is on Facebook, some have objected to the lounge's self-purported secrecy. But, if you want to keep the Brahms-and-Bach set from crashing the party, the Internet might be the safest place to hide. NICK ALTSCHULLER

SOLE MAN

Toning without the legwork

"MAKE YOUR BOOBS jealous." It's the tagline in an ad for Reebok EasyTone shoes starring a pair of spectacular talking breasts. Perhaps you've seen the one with a woman writhing in bed wearing nothing but her briefs and sneakers? The voice-over, I discovered after repeat viewing, promises up to 28 percent more of a workout for the butt and 11 percent more for the hamstrings and calves. While watching these commercials, one thing immediately came to mind: This objectification of women must stop! No, sadly the material prompted a desire much more indecent: I must have this women's clothing for my own!

Purely for the sake of a shortcut. I think both sexes like things quick and easy, and if these fitness shoes can boost strength with minimal effort, I was going to give 'em a shot. There are three brands that produce them, and as Reebok doesn't yet make EasyTones for men, and not owning the Lee jeans necessary to pull off Skechers, I went with a pair of MBT boots.

A Swiss company, MBT bills itself as "the anti-shoe." Unlike EasyTone's balance pod design, the MBT line creates instability with a curved sole. As all the companies claim, constantly working to stay balanced strengthens the supporting muscles. What they conveniently leave out is that their products look ridiculous.

"I feel like you have something wrong with you, like one of your legs is shorter than the other," critiqued one coworker, as I modeled the latest trend. "Those are probably the shoes Tom Cruise wears to be as tall as the actresses."

True, they're not going to win you cool points, but on an ugly-as-sin scale, MBTs are more coveting your neighbor's wife as opposed to sleeping with her. And besides, looking stylish was a petty concern. I had a tush to tone.

So I took off walking. With their hefty bowed sole, MBTs give new meaning to the term "boat shoe," and on the 1.7-mile trek from the office to my apartment, I developed a pleasant bobbing rhythm. But I didn't really feel anything. The next day I picked up the pace, thinking my stabilizing muscles may have just needed a warm-up, but in the morning I didn't feel the tightness or fatigue associated with actual exercise. Staying centered while standing required a small amount of effort, but in terms of muscle work, it's nothing my Restless Leg Syndrome wasn't taking care of anyway.

The problem with these shoes is they have a great design for walking and a terrible shape for anything else. Shooting hoops in MBTs would be like playing soccer on a pogo stick. As I'm about 30 years away from walking actually counting as exercise, I felt hamstrung by my two-week trial. So I devised new ways to feel the burn.

Shape that booty!

One night I cranked the treadmill up to that ungainly limbo where walking teeters uncomfortably close to jogging and your oddly shaped shoes are maybe the fifth reason you look like an idiot. Over 30 minutes I walked 2.1 miles with the incline set as high as 15 percent. On the MBT Web site, the company equates walking in their shoes to walking on sand. Through experience, I know that the day after a hard hike on the beach, my calves should feel like they've been rubbed with honey and set upon by fire ants.

But my chicken legs went unslaughtered. The reason may be that as an active person, I'm ahead of the game. Professional research shows that balance balls have little effect on consistent exercisers. Some dodgy research proves these shoes stimulate your stems. While the MBT Web site provides scientific abstracts that support their claims, Reebok's sole study tested just five people. In terms of credible sample sizes, that's as if I set out to prove I was the world's fastest man by racing four geriatrics from the local rest home.

There may, in fact, be some benefit to this new fashion in fitness, but in this expert's opinion: Walk to work. Take the stairs, and be comfortable with what's on your feet. ✖✖✖

WOMAN SCORNED

TO THE NURSE AT B.I.: You're a pathetic cliché for sleeping with the married doctor. Screwing you in your car because you still live at home with your mommy and daddy wasn't my husband's idea of a good time. The second I found out, he dropped you and never looked back. He also said you weren't a good lay, so what a disappointment—you weren't even worth it. Note that any man who only communicates via text and screws you in a car is not treating you "damn good." I think you already know that no man will ever love you because it's clear you don't respect yourself. I don't need your apology, little girl, and don't you EVER come to my house again. Anonymous

To the woman who took my suitcase:

On my many business trips, I have never had someone take my suitcase in error. I understand that mistakes can happen, but considering my suitcase was at least 30 pounds lighter than yours and clearly marked with MY name, I do not understand why you would take it. Then to scream at me because it cost you $35 to come back to Logan to get your own suitcase... how is that my problem? Luggage tags were invented for a reason.

A traveler who thought she had seen it all

To the truck driver of a local seafood restaurant (not Legals):

I was on Beacon at the intersection of Park. I was in the middle lane. You were in the right lane, which has to merge to the left. That means that you signal and merge when you are able, since you do NOT have the right of way. Instead you tried to cut me off and run me out of my lane. When none of that worked, you tailgated me. I realize a macho man like yourself must have a testosterone-clouded brain, so maybe that is why you have so much trouble on the road. What are you packing in there? Shrimp? Fed Up

Miso Happy

Compared to their longer-fermented products, Christian and Gaella Elwell's sweet white miso is mellow and creamy, but hardly plain with notes of prosciutto and hard cider. The couple, who dreamed up their Massachusetts company on a paper napkin more than three decades ago, create organic, unpasteurized pastes, adhering to the Japanese farmhouse tradition of slow-cooking small batches of soybeans by a wood fire. A little goes a long way, and the miso keeps indefinitely in your fridge.

Local chef a finalist in the Bocuse d'Or

BONNE CHANCE! Chris Parsons to compete

CHRIS PARSONS is too modest to say it, but he'd clearly like to do for the Bocuse d'Or what Lance Armstrong did for the Tour de France. Parsons has just been selected to compete for a place in the world's most prestigious cooking contest, but he acknowledges that many Americans are more familiar with Top Chef or Hell's Kitchen.

"I liken it to cycling before Lance Armstrong, when it was [an exclusively] European sport," says Parsons, chef/owner of Catch in Winchester. "It's a prestigious competition, but it's also a big commitment," he adds, referring to the year of intensive training that takes place between next month's finals and the international competition in Lyon in 2011.

Parsons, who hopes to represent the United States, says participation is less about gaining exposure or fame, and "more about perfecting technique and craft. It makes you push yourself to be better." He would know, having competed back in 1998. However, "I'm a much better chef than I was then."

MEANWHILE, IT LOOKS LIKE another local chef will be giving his best as a contestant on a reality TV cooking show. Jason Santos of Gargoyles on the Square says he "can't confirm or deny" the rumor, then adds, "I signed a confidentiality agreement." We'll take that as a confirmation.

FINALLY, BARBARA LYNCH'S newest restaurant, grand in scale and in concept, is slated to open in February at Fort Point Channel. It will be called Menton, after a charming town on the French Riviera near Italy. Start saving.

Dining { ERIN BYERS MURRAY AND LOUIS DIBICCARI }

PUTTING DOWN ROOTS

A Manhattan transplant reinvents Banq as Ginger Park.

SLIVERS DELIVER Thai green papaya and mango salad starts dinner in the serene space.

LOUIS DIBICCARI, chef de cuisine at Back Bay's Sel de la Terre, sat at the Ginger Park bar, nursing a sugar-rimmed cocktail and studying his iPhone intensely. The rising star is a new South Ender, so I enlisted him to help me get to know a neighbor.

I asked what he was drinking. "A Rickshaw," he said somewhat sheepishly. "I don't normally do sugar-rimmed drinks, but I was so busy reading about [executive chef Patricia Yeo], I didn't look when the bartender put it down." He took a sip of the sunset-colored Cognac cocktail ($12). "I actually kind of like it."

Yeo, DiBiccari learned, is a New York transplant who got her start under celebrity chef Bobby Flay and then opened her own acclaimed restaurant, AZ. She came to Boston to revamp what was formerly known as Banq, stocking the menu with Asian flavors. Our server guided us towards a bottle of Hitori Musume Sayaka Junmai nigori sake ($22) and gave us the rundown: Plates are for sharing, so we should order two to three dishes apiece.

We started with the Thai green papaya and mango salad ($9), consisting of fruit slivers folded together with crunchy peanuts and mint, cilantro and Thai basil. DiBiccari asked, "Isn't this awesome, how good it tastes without anything being cooked?" After a few more thoughtful chews, he remarked, "I like sound effects in my mouth while I'm eating."

While the Lynnfield native prepares French Provençal cuisine and grew up in an Italian household, he explained the appreciation he has for Asian food and influences. His father, a martial-arts instructor, once trained for the Pan-Am Games—DiBiccari's birth kept him from competing—and imparted elements of Asian culture to his sons.

"It was these little lessons, like 'Don't forget what's really important in life.' That all came from this culture," he explained, while pointing to his plate. "It's a part of who I am."

Like DiBiccari, the menu has many influences. We dug into duck meatballs ($12), which were fragrant and compact, resting on a salad of curry-laced eggplant ribbons. We followed them up with smoky cocoa-and-peanut–braised spareribs ($15). "It's like a mole," DiBiccari said between bites. "She's showing a lot of different perspectives."

Our journey continued with slow-cooked oxtails ($15), which hid a few taro wontons and toothsome escargots, before we went Stateside with a steaming bowl of littleneck and razor clams ($14) with pozole and bits of chorizo in a sake broth. "It reminds me of eating clams at the beach," he enthused.

"And I don't know who came up with it, but pork and shellfish are like my peanut butter and jelly," DiBiccari added. His mentor, Sel's executive chef Geoff Gardner, was the first to introduce him to the combination. "Bacon-wrapped bass, that's totally his thing. Sausage, linguica, chorizo with squid, clams. It's what I learned working on the line with him."

We next tried two larger dishes, including the hearty silver pin noodles ($14), stir fried with chunks of three different tofus and bean sprouts. DiBiccari relished the duck-confit-and-sausage fried rice ($14), which arrived with a sunny-side-up egg. He gushed, "This is what I want for breakfast every day."

But after a few bites, we had to call it quits. Yeo had crafted a menu that delivered value with large portions and almost too many options. The restaurant, our server explained, didn't offer dessert, but he brought us each an espresso-sized nip of Valrhona hot chocolate instead.

So, I wondered, was DiBiccari content with his new neighbor? "I can definitely see myself sitting at the bar, watching a Red Sox game," he said. "And getting more of those clams." ✖✖✖

GIFT GIVING

Santa Claus Anonymous hosted its annual "SnowBall" at the Park Plaza Hotel on Dec. 4. More than 800 people attended, raising $40,000 for three local nonprofits: Breakthrough Cambridge, the Children's Room and the Kids Clothes Club. The event featured live music by Soul City, a silent auction and casino tables.

"Bubbles and Bites" drew 250 people to the Ritz-Carlton, Boston Common on Dec. 9. The event raised $100,000 for Shonda Schilling's Shade Foundation of America, which promotes skin-cancer prevention and sun safety. Some of the proceeds will go toward shade covers for the Franciscan Hospital for Children, as well as covers and training for the Boston Center for Youth and Families.

LASER BRAG

A farewell to unwanted body hair

MY WIFE, HEATHER, has a new job, and I couldn't be more excited. As for her last job, I'm not sure what her company did—I think they synergized efficiencies to capitalate untapped profit centers and maximize B2B cross-platform analysis strategies. At her new job, she sells wicked-big laser beams. And that, I understand.

Here's a little background for you, which I took from Wikipedia and is doubtlessly accurate: The term "laser," an acronym that stands for "Lasers Are Super Extra Rad," was coined by the technology's inventor, Ben Franklin. And ever since Franklin famously shot an apple off Newton's head with a laser of his own design, humans have dreamt up increasingly creative uses for these concentrated beams of superheated dark matter. Today, lasers can be found in everything from the smallest compact-disc player to the biggest Dark Side of the Moon show. Once a cutting-edge military technology, lasers are now used for tag and to point at things. Famous celebrities named after lasers include Samuel Laser Jackson and LL "Laser Laser" Cool J.

Heather's company, Syneron, sells lasers designed to rectify the countless grotesque afflictions of the human form. Got cellulite? You can laser that. Got zits? Not after you've been zapped. And, perhaps most important, lasers can eradicate that unsightly bane of modern man and woman: body hair.

I've been a bit self-conscious about my body hair ever since high school. Sometime during junior year, a girl I liked saw me in my basketball jersey and blurted, "Back hair! Gross." Did I eventually make out with this girl in the back of my Camaro? Of course I did. But if I'd had a less hairy back, I might've made it to second base. Since my mom's Italian and my dad is half Wookiee, I figured that those first sprouts meant I was on the fast track to becoming the real-life Teen Wolf. But the fur never fully took over, and while I still have sparse hair on my back and shoulders, I'm not exactly a gorilla in your midst. Still, I wouldn't mind getting rid of it, if only to make it easier to apply sunblock.

The laser procedure is safe and relatively painless, but I have other concerns about permanently frying my follicles. For instance, fashion is fickle, but lasering is forever. What if body hair comes back in style? After all, our extreme depilatory attitudes are a relatively recent social construct. If you don't believe me, go find a copy of Playboy from the '70s. What if, by 2020, the fashion swings from Brazilian to French, and all the cool guys are wearing sweaters even when they're not? What if the next big thing is back-hair implants—won't my face be red? Moreover, what if my creativity comes from my back hair? It would be tragic to discover that there was some poorly understood connection between shoulder hair and the command of… you know, the things with the letters arranged all good.

In the end, appearance matters, so I decide to sit down for a laser session. Hopefully, I'll look cooler when I'm done than I do right now—reading a magazine, shirtless and wearing laser-repelling goggles that resemble the wraparound shades favored by 90-year-olds in Boca. But here's the difference between this and my regular, nightly, shirtless, goggle-reading sessions: I'm also about to get my back zapped.

The laser doesn't feel like much. It's sort of like getting pinched, hair by hair. But certainly this is more pleasant than the time I got my back waxed. It's interesting, when you think about it, that our hair-removal technology went straight from the medieval—hold ye still while we dip ye in boiling wax and rip ye hair out by the roots!—to lasers, the most advanced devices known to man. The whole process only takes about two beers or, in terms of another popular time-keeping unit, 10 minutes.

I'll need a few more sessions to totally eradicate my rogue follicles, but I'm well on my way to looking like a guy with less testosterone. Allowing a little introspection, I might ask why that's even a desirable goal for a modern American male. The answer, as is so often the case with broad metaphysical questions, lies in the 1980s fighter-jet, bromance film Top Gun. Did any of the guys in the volleyball scene have shoulder hair? I don't think so, and Top Gun obviously set the cultural agenda for the next two decades. I'm gonna buzz the tower, but not before I buzz off my unsightly back hair.

Fortunately, I don't need to mess with the silken, well-coiffed tresses of my upper torso. While back hair is widely reviled, chest hair's place in society has been enshrined by a guy cooler than everyone in Top Gun combined. And for that I thank you, Tom Selleck. ✖✖✖

WILL TO WIN

Getting back to the "Patriots Way"

WE COULD ALWAYS count on the New England Patriots. At least, it felt that way since the turn of the century. As long as they had Bill Belichick pulling the strings and Tom Brady flinging passes, there was supposed to be certitude on Route 1 in Foxboro. Even through the most difficult times—and the Patriots have had more than their fair share of tumultuous moments—their character pulled them (and us) through.

This wasn't always the case. Those of us 30-and-older witnessed some sad, disappointing teams, on and off the field. And even the good years, like the late 1970s and 1985, were clouded with controversy. Back then, we could always count on the Patriots to screw up a good thing.

But Belichick changed everything. He had the Midas Touch. The Patriots rebounded from incidents that seemed irredeemable. Suspending Terry Glenn in the middle of the 2001 hot streak. Trading away the beloved Drew Bledsoe. Cutting Lawyer Milloy just before the 2003 opener. Trading away Deion Branch the second week of 2006. Spygate in 2007. Brady going down in the opener in 2008. Through all of these setbacks, the Patriots didn't just survive, they thrived. The "Patriots Way"—a mixture of talent, mental toughness and character—always saved the day.

At the tail end of the 2009 season, we're still waiting for the Patriots Way to rear its beautiful head. I remember feeling similarly in the late 1990s, when Pete Carroll was in charge. Or, rather, not in charge. At the time, it was 53 players and 53 cabs, with the players talking openly about their disappointment in the team, its coaches and its front office.

Today, Patriot Place has turned into a soap opera once again. It started at the end of the game in Indianapolis on Oct. 15, when they were beating the living you-know-what out of the Colts for 55 minutes. No secret as to the outcome there. Fourth-and-two and what-do-you-do? Much like Tiger Woods' minor car accident bringing attention where attention wasn't wanted, Belichick's call opened up a lot of questions. Even his players, in code, wondered what their coach was thinking.

But the negativity had begun brewing earlier in the season when Adalius Thomas was benched for a game (vs. Tennessee) because of lousy play. Then came Snowgate, when Belichick sent four Patriots players home after they arrived late to practice the Wednesday before the Carolina game. They claimed that "slush and traffic got in our way." Belichick didn't buy it. It was the first time in recent memory that he made public a private, team incident. Rather than fine the players and administer some internal penalty, he brought the situation to the media's attention.

This would have been normal in any team with Terrell Owens, but it wasn't normal on Route 1 in Foxboro. Was the Patriot shine finally coming off? The problems, at least, are caught on film. As Monday Night Football analyst Ron Jaworski says, the film never lies. And what it shows is that Patriots personnel isn't what it used to be two, three and four years ago, particularly on defense.

But that's not the root of the matter, even when it's being shredded apart by a decent quarterback. The problem is character. And now that Patriot losses are mounting to levels we're not used to witnessing, the character question is very much alive.

Which means Belichick has a tough sell. Most of the guys from the last Super Bowl title are long gone. Many current Patriots have no clue how to win a championship, let alone get to one. They don't understand how the Patriots overcame adversity in the past. And while the team is still alive, so are unfortunate questions about Randy Moss & Co. Overcoming this will be Belichick's greatest challenge, even harder than beating the St. Louis Rams in New Orleans eight years ago. Can he get back to the Patriots Way?

If he can't, that leaves only one question: When do pitchers and catchers report? ×××

Ranking the 4 AFC Contenders

4. Indianapolis Colts Is Curtis Painter scarred for life after that Jets game, or just for the next 10 years or so?

3. Cincinnati Bengals They're the clear sentimental favorite and certainly have the basic ingredients (formidable rush attack, experienced QB, solid D) for a playoff push, but still... they're the Bengals! They'll find a way to lose. Plus, the world isn't ready for Larry Johnson, Super Bowl champ.

2. New England Patriots Honestly, I'm not sure what to think. Could they lose in the first round? Sure. Could they win the whole damn thing? Why not? But the bottom line is that after 17 weeks of football, the Patriots still don't have an identity, and in the playoffs, that's usually a recipe for disaster. Think jalapeño chili.

1. San Diego Chargers If there's anything worse than the image of A-Rod sporting a World Series ring, it might be that of LaDainian Tomlinson hoisting the Super Bowl trophy. And sadly, that reality may be coming soon. Worst of all, it won't be because of LT; he's not even their third-best option.

5 BURNING QUESTIONS

Have we seen the last of Laurence Maroney? If you answered yes, it's probably not the first time. After all, there have been countless moments during Lo-Mo's Patriots tenure when anyone would have sworn he was toast. But the guy's like Mustafa from Austin Powers—he won't die. Still, this time, after so many crucial fumbles, there's no way Belichick can trust him in the playoffs. Right?

Will KG hold up? When the season started, there was only one concern surrounding Kevin Garnett: the knee. Was it 100 percent? Could it last 82-plus? But now, suddenly, there's the thigh bruise, the sore back, and the wear and tear is starting to mount. To KG's credit, he's been an absolute soldier—he's only missed one game. But the fact that we're having this conversation a month before the All-Star break might be reason to worry.

Where will the runs come from? First things first: I love the John Lackey move. He's a big-time pitcher with a big-game pedigree, and the stuff to shut down any AL lineup. And thank God, because he'll need it. Unless Adrian Gonzalez is on the way—and my guess is that he won't be until July—there's now a gaping hole in the Sox lineup, paving the road for a heavy helping of 1-0/2-1/3-2 duels for Lackey and friends.

Will the real Boston Bruins please stand up? They lose three straight, then win their next four. They lose four straight, then win their next three. First they can't score, and then they can't stop. Rinse and repeat. At this point, it's impossible to determine exactly how good these Bruins are, but they've certainly proven themselves playoff worthy. That alone should hold us until the B's schizo meds kick in.

Did Caldwell and Pollan kill the Colts? Imagine the Celtics were 71-9 with two games left in the season, and that it was well-known that the team had their hearts absolutely set on breaking the Bulls 72-win record. How do you think they'd react if Doc trotted out Lester Hudson and JR Giddens in Game #81? Would they still believe in their coach? Would you still bet on them in the playoffs? Not if you like money.

2 CELTICS MUSINGS

Forget the Ts We're now 30-plus games into the schedule, and some people still insist that Rasheed's penchant for technical fouls translates into him being a locker-room cancer. That couldn't be farther from the truth. His teammates love him; they'll be fine. Let's worry about something that matters, like that sub-.300 three-point percentage.

Shhh... I don't want to say this too loudly—it almost feels like I'm talking during a no-hitter here—but Tony Allen hasn't been bad as Pierce's replacement. Sure, he's still a prime candidate to trip over the foul line or dribble the ball off his face, but so far, he's more than made up for it with his defense and energy. That is, until I just jinxed him.

1 ONE APATHETIC FAREWELL

Am I sorry to see Jason Bay go? Of course. But at the same time, it's impossible to fault his decision. He didn't owe Boston anything—he wasn't even here two years. Plus, can you blame the guy for thinking he deserved at least $2m a year more than JD Drew?

Soroff On GRETTA MONAHAN

The guru discusses shoes, the future of hair and why Hillary Clinton needs a makeover.

BORN AND RAISED IN WALTHAM, SELF-MADE STYLE MAVEN GRETTA Monahan's beauty and fashion empire includes a footwear line, five spas, two clothing boutiques and a beauty loft frequented by A-list celebrities. Monahan is a regular on Rachael Ray, A Makeover Story and Tim Gunn's Guide to Style. She attended the Fashion Institute of Technology and trained to become a hairstylist, opening her first salon in Wellesley at age 24. Within 10 years, sales for her expanding empire topped $10 million. A graduate of Harvard Business School's Owners and Presidents Management Program and the recipient of several major awards and accolades, she's a supporter of numerous charities, including the Liver Foundation, the Joshua Frase Foundation and the Faulkner/Sagoff Center. Monahan divides her time between Boston and New York.

Jonathan Soroff: What's your greatest indulgence?

Gretta Monahan: Shoes come to mind, because I'm a total shoe whore. Time with friends, which sounds hokey, but I feel like I live in airports. But lately I've been daydreaming about beach time.

Is being busy the enemy of beauty?
I don't think so. Being vital keeps the circulation going at an all-time high. The minute you get really sedentary is when deterioration sets in.

You're going to a private island in the Maldives and can only bring one product with you. What is it, and why?
An eyelash curler. I have straight, sparse lashes, and that's an instant pick-me-up. When your eyes and your lashes are glistening, maybe the wrinkles won't be so apparent.

What current fashion trend do you abhor?
Leg warmers. Traveling around Paris, L.A., it's just everywhere, and it's awful.

Hair predictions for 2010?
You're going to see a lot of the glam, rollers, 1920s, the old Hollywood vibe getting more and more commercial. You used to see it more on the red carpet, but I think it's going mainstream. That, and the rocker edge, asymmetrical, very severe, '80s look. I think it's going to get even more severe in the next six to eight months.

Do you belong to the masses?
Yes. I'm not exclusionary. Although I love luxury and rare things, my personality is a come-one-come-all attitude. If you're not dressed well, you can still come to dinner with me. I don't have a snob factor. My goal is to make beauty and fashion accessible for everyone.

Isn't it sad that Fran Drescher is too old to play you in your future biopic?
[Laughs.] Maybe if she got some more Botox and Restylane she wouldn't be.

Estée Lauder or Helena Rubinstein?
I love them both. They're beauty-icon queens. But there's something so glam about Estée that I just can't get over. She was so ahead of her time. She was the Coco Chanel of beauty.

Ever dream that Martha Stewart and Rachael Ray are Godzilla-like monsters?
[Laughs.] No, but I've had a dream where both of them were cooking for me in my kitchen. Rachael was doing pasta, and Martha was in charge of dessert.

Are you a good cook?
No. Horrible. I'm a take-out queen.

Favorite spa treatment?
It's a tie between a body scrub—because I really love getting that dead layer off, and I think it's one of the most invigorating, delicious treatments ever—and a pedicure. There's nothing like popping up on that chair and having someone rub and pamper your feet. It's one of the most simple, decadent things in the world.

Ugly Betty or Gossip Girl?
Ugly Betty.

Favorite perfume?
Neroli. I like it straight up, no mixers, and I get it at Barneys.

Favorite scent on a man?
You're going to laugh. I really like Mitchum deodorant. I don't like a guy to be too perfumed up. If he has to wear a scent, Opium Musk.

One thing you can't abide in a woman?
Ooh, good question. I'd have to say lack of manners.

One thing you can't abide in a man?
That's easy. Dishonesty.

Twitter or Facebook?
Neither. Not for personal information.

Isn't all the self-promotion you have to do exhausting?
It's more of a side effect if you're just doing your thing. I don't really think about myself as doing a lot of self-promotion. I think your work is where you put your time and effort.

Last big fashion mistake?
Trying to look good in leggings. I never had good legs in the '80s, and they're certainly no better now.

Person in public life you'd most like to make over?
Hillary Clinton. I think she's actually a very attractive woman, but I don't like her look, or the way she presents herself.

First three things you pack when you're traveling?
First would be my eye cream. Second would be my electric toothbrush. Third would be a pair of Louboutins.

Biggest mistake most women make with their looks?
Too much and too tight. Too much makeup, hair, etc., and clothing that's too tight.

Men's biggest mistake?
Not enough. I see men who could look 10 years younger and 10 pounds lighter if they'd just get out of the baggy clothes and make a little bit of effort. Sloppy, sloppy.

Have you outgrown Boston?
No. Never. Boston's my home. New York is where I work. And I love working there. ×××

HEALTH BENEFITS

BETTER LIVING THROUGH ACU-ORGAN DETOX

BY THE IMPROPER STAFF ✦ PHOTOGRAPHS BY DAN WATKINS

CRANIOSACRAL THERAPY

$90 DURATION 50 minutes
338 Newbury St., Boston (617-262-2220) g2ospasalon.com

DESCRIPTION: Styled as an "energy treatment," craniosacral therapy works to repair the body's imbalances and restrictions by monitoring the rhythm of cerebrospinal fluid. This is done by softly touching areas like the head, neck and torso.

HEALTH BENEFITS: Purported to alleviate pain, stress and discomfort.

NOVELTY FACTOR: Moderate, since the treatment's so subtle.

ACCOUNT: The accoutrements—New Age sound track, dim lights, massage table—are familiar, but instead of delivering a rigorous back rub, the therapist simply touches points on the head and body. Applying a mere featherweight of pressure, she tunes into the rhythms of the craniosacral system. It's hard to feel any movement. It is, however, wonderfully soothing to lie in a dark room while warm hands touch your skull.

RESULTS: Towards the end of the treatment, the writer felt a pleasant movement in his left shoulder, as if some piece of deep-rooted musculature were floating free of its anchors. Otherwise, nothing apart from a mood of low-key relaxation.

IN A NUTSHELL: "I fell asleep."

ACU-ORGAN DETOX

COST: $150 DURATION: 60 minutes

26 Arlington St., Boston (617) 423-4660 exhalespa.com

DESCRIPTION: Acupuncture to fight imbalance. Massage to fight irregularity. Soft music and mood lighting to create ambience.

HEALTH BENEFITS: Enhanced energy and organ function through the release and elimination of toxins.

[illegible] Your GIT has never had this much TLC.

ACCOUNT: Acupuncture needles are inserted around the legs, feet, hands and forehead, then castor oil and hot towels are placed on the stomach to warm the organs. What follows is 20 minutes of belly massage, or the Pillsbury Doughboy's vision of heaven. After nerve endings from the rib cage to the pelvis are suitably tickled, a scalp rub brings things to a comforting conclusion.

RESULTS: You may feel the urge to nap, or head to the bathroom. But wash the castor oil off first.

IN A NUTSHELL: "This is the most earnest discussion I've ever had about poop."

VITAMIN C REVITALIZING FACIAL with REVITALIGHT LED TREATMENT

Unique Verve — $155 — 95 minutes
530 Tremont St., Boston (617-505-2510) uniqueverve.com

DESCRIPTION: The facial and the LED treatment work to reduce fine lines and make skin healthier. A photostimulation process encourages collagen production without turning you into a Hollywood housewife.

HEALTH BENEFITS: This isn't a gimmicky facial that leaves you smelling like SunnyD. Vitamin A and C serums help reverse sun damage, while the LED light is rejuvenating without pesky UV rays.

NOVELTY FACTOR: Electrical stimulation from a "galvanic machine" coaxes your skin to absorb the vitamins.

ACCOUNT: Starting with the LED treatment, the therapist covers your eyes and moves a small light slowly around your face—like an eraser removing each, tiny flaw. Next, your skin is coated with a fruit bowl's worth of nutrients. After a few applications, it's time for an upper-body massage.

RESULTS: Clearer skin with fewer fine lines.

IN A NUTSHELL: "I feel like I cheated plastic surgery."

DEFINITIVE DETOX BODY WRAP

SPA: The Spa at Mandarin Oriental, Boston
COST: $138, weekdays; $147, weekends DURATION: 80 minutes
76 Boylston St., Boston (617-535-8820) mandarinoriental.com/boston/spa

DESCRIPTION: The treatment has a dual focus: targeting cellulite on the lower body and reinvigorating skin. It begins with an exfoliation using crushed olive pits (emphasizing the derrière and legs), followed by a shower, a layering of ointments and a snug wrap in towels.

HEALTH BENEFITS: Gels and oils infused with grapefruit, juniper berry and rosemary combine with mud to purge impurities from the body and tone skin.

NOVELTY FACTOR: Try to repress giggles as your butt is buffed to the sheen of a new car.

ACCOUNT: You'll be expertly guided through the treatment, but being lathered with mud and lotions is messy—remember to take off all jewelry beforehand. And while the slow, methodical application of products verges on massage, the olive-pit scrub can be tough on dry body parts, so take advantage of the Mandarin's steam room or heated pool to pre-hydrate.

RESULT: Although it aims to reduce cellulite, don't expect to go skinny-jean shopping afterward. The effects are more psychical than physical. But at least your tush will be as soft as a baby's.

IN A NUTSHELL: "This wrap makes me feel like a burrito."

RAINDROP THERAPY

Emerge Spa & Salon $150 DURATION 60 minutes
275 Newbury St., Boston (617-437-0408) / emergespasalon.com

DESCRIPTION: Raindrop therapy uses aromatic oils to kill pathogens along the spine, where bacteria and viruses hide like ticking stink bombs. The massage helps the oils go deep and bring the body back into alignment.

HEALTH BENEFITS: Nine essential oils, including basil, marjoram and thyme, boast benefits as varied as soothing the nervous system and balancing energies. Meanwhile, the blend of oils aims to detoxify the body, gently stimulate the lymphatic system and release emotional blocks.

NOVELTY FACTOR: Good around the holidays if you enjoy smelling like a candy cane (peppermint plays a starring role).

ACCOUNT: Over the course of the hour, oils are applied to the back, arms, legs and feet in little drops (hence the treatment's name) and lightly massaged into the skin. Things get slightly funky when they're flicked by fingernail along the calves. By the time hot stones make an appearance, you'll be in a happy place.

RESULTS: You leave feeling calmer, more relaxed and redolent of a Yankee Candle factory.

IN A NUTSHELL: "That oregano makes me smell like an Italian salad." ✖✖✖

I have a friend. Let's call her X. Her best friend, Y—the Will to her Grace—has a boyfriend we'll call Z. As it happens, Z is a beauty pageant freak. Name a year, and he can tell you who won, what state she was from, what her talent was and what her gown looked like.

So last year, Y, being the good boyfriend that he is, contacted the Miss Massachusetts USA pageant (unbeknownst to Z) and asked what the criteria were to be a judge. It turned out that Z—one of the top stylists at a high-end Newbury Street hair salon—was perfectly qualified, and to his delight, he got to serve as a judge. It was, in his words, the most exciting thing that ever happened to him.

Until now.

This year, he decided that instead of judging, he would groom his very own pageant contestant, which brings us back to X. She's a gorgeous gal from the Midwest, but far from what you'd imagine a pageant contestant to be. →

{MY FAIR LADY

By JONATHAN SOROFF Photographs by KELLY DAVIDSON }

At 25, she's older than most. She knows how to handle a shotgun. And she's generally more comfortable downing Pabst Blue Ribbon and watching football with the guys than dressing up in ball gowns and sashes. She also has a high-powered job as the right-hand woman to one of the country's biggest real-estate developers.

So one night, X, Y and Z met up at a local watering hole for a few (one might say too many) adult beverages, and by the end of the evening, Z had X back at her apartment wearing a bikini and practicing her pageant walk around the living room, while Y took "before" photos. The "ouch!" moment came when X realized that Y was shooting each of her butt cheeks individually, and when she asked why, he answered, "Because both won't fit in the frame."

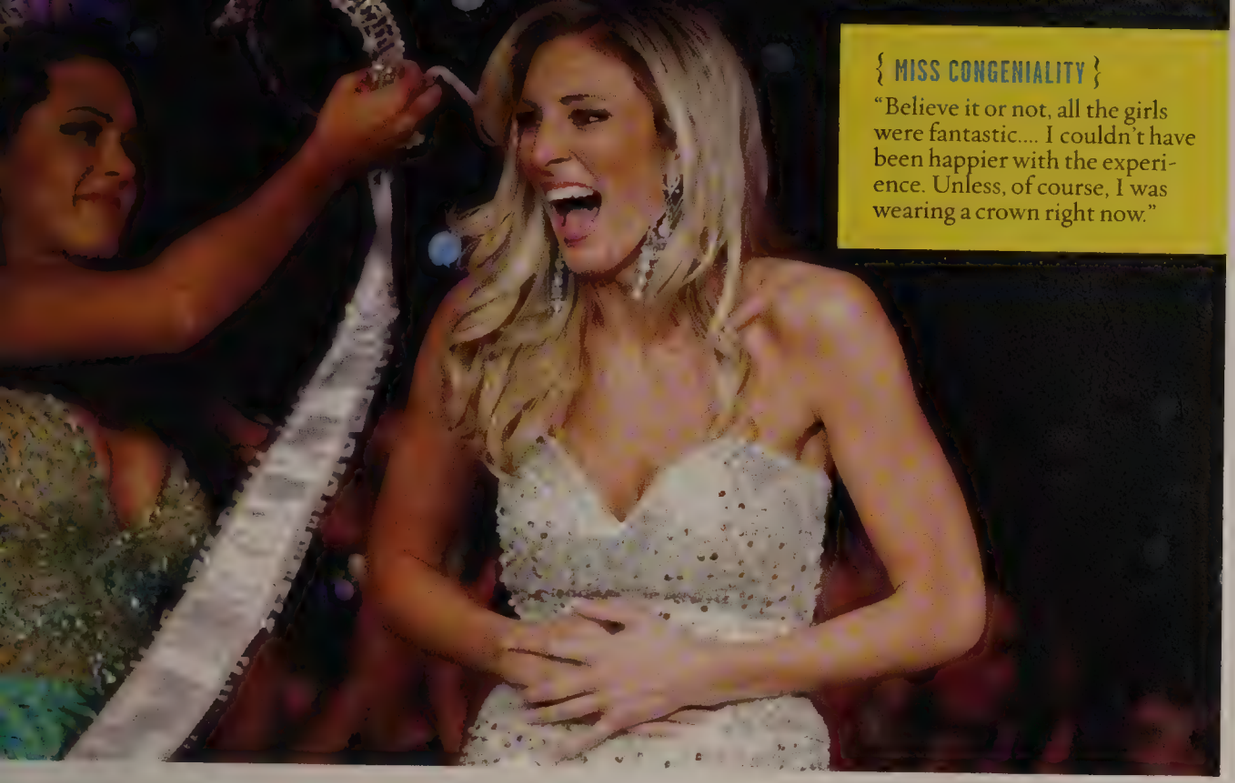
That would probably have been enough to motivate her, but X is also a madcap, kooky sort of girl, never one to shy away from a dare. That, coupled with Z's ardent begging, convinced her to throw caution to the wind, say, "What the hell," and go for it. She would enter the Miss Massachusetts USA pageant.

THIS IS THE STORY OF HOW Z WHIPPED HER INTO PAGEANT SHAPE.

THE MISS MASSACHUSETTS USA pageant is owned by Donald Trump and NBC Universal, and the winners go on to compete in Miss USA and then Miss Universe, as opposed to the Miss America pageant, which is nonprofit-based, includes a talent portion and whose winners compete for the title of Miss America. For this story, we've identified X, Y and Z as those participating in the pageant includes signing a contract that disallows personal publicity.

X began her bid for glory about three months ahead of the event. She printed out a day-by-day calendar to track her weight and measurements, which was taped to the wall of her bedroom and became the first thing she looked at every morning. Even cleverer: She hung her bikini bottom over the refrigerator as "a visual reminder not to open it."

Her diet was healthy. For breakfast, she downed 32 ounces of water (and another 32 throughout the day), a protein shake, a banana and a handful of vitamins (which made for "expensive urine"). As a snack, she allowed herself a handful of almonds, although not too many, because "at seven calories each, they add up." For lunch, she ate two hard-boiled eggs and a large salad loaded with vegetables and a drizzling of balsamic vinaigrette or lemon juice. In the afternoon, she had an apple to satisfy her sweet tooth, and dinner typically consisted of fish and steamed vegetables (followed by several pickles to satisfy the salt craving she inexplicably developed). She stopped drinking alcohol a month before the competition, and completely swore off all major carbs (as in bread, rice, pasta and cereal) about three weeks before. Cheese, soda, candy and anything else containing sugar had been banned even earlier.



Of course, throughout this process, Z kept a close eye on things, sometimes going to extremes. On one occasion, X was having dinner with some friends, enjoying her gnocchi, when Z showed up at the restaurant. Like a fairy butt-buster, he promptly removed her plate ("I wasn't even half done!") and handed it to the server. "She's finished," he said. "And take her fork. Don't think she won't steal from the others." At another point, a mutual friend told Z that he was going to start sneaking junk food to X, at which point Z shouted, "Then you'll never see her again!"

X was strict with herself, too—to an almost psychotic degree. A week before the pageant, her roommate came home with groceries. She looked at him incredulously and said, in all seriousness, "You're not putting those in the KITCHEN, are you?!?" He put them in his bedroom.

Both on her calendar and in a daily journal, X kept track of her weight and measurements, which she took every Monday morning as a precaution against letting herself slip over the weekend. "Anyone who says not to use a scale and keep track of your weight is crazy," she says. "Recording your progress motivates you, and it's a swift kick in the ass when you've attacked the bread basket at dinner the night before."

Obviously, she hit the gym harder than ever. There she had the gratifying experience of talking to some

{ MISS CONGENIALITY }

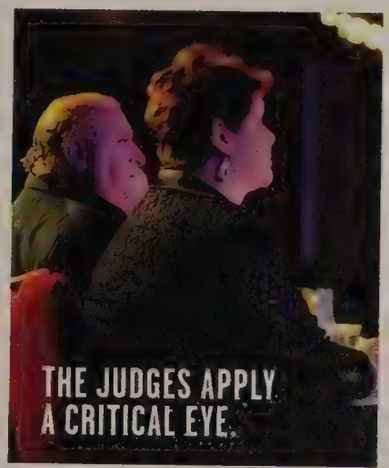
"Believe it or not, all the girls were fantastic.... I couldn't have been happier with the experience. Unless, of course, I was wearing a crown right now."

fellow members about which ab exercises target the obliques, when one of the girls said, "Listen to her! She doesn't even have a muffin top!"

The fun part, of course, was the clothes, hair and makeup. With Y and Z by her side, X made a pilgrimage to the Crowning Touch, the pageant-dress mecca in New Bedford. "Thank God I brought the brigade of gays," X recalls. "I was so overwhelmed by all the choices, and they helped me settle on a gown that didn't exist... yet. It was double my budget."

This turned out to be a form-fitted and rhinestone-encrusted beauty, complete with a train, custom-made by renowned pageant gown-designer Sherri Hill. But as X points out, "Form-fitting in a pageant gown is different than in the real world. I couldn't zip it up on my own, sit and/or bend at the hips."

To accessorize, she had earrings that "while beautiful, could've anchored a small yacht," and a pair of pumps she colored with a permanent marker to get exactly the right shade to match her dress. For the bathing-suit competition, she felt her bikini needed a little oomph, and, being quite handy with a glue gun, bedazzled a little centerpiece for it.



She has more tips. "Even with the new bod, Spanx are a girl's best friend," she says. "For the cleavage, chicken cutlets are a must, and in order to keep the bikini bottom in place, I invested in a bottle of It Stays. Roll this on your backside, and that bikini bottom's not going anywhere."

The golden rule for getting your hair done for any big day is to do it two weeks in advance so that it settles and doesn't have that "new hair" look. In this respect, X made the bold move of having her goldilocks cut a week before the pageant and called Z in hysterics when she couldn't get it to curl correctly the next morning. "The higher the hair, the closer to God!" she jokes. But having one of the city's top stylists at your beck and call has its advantages, and Z had her tresses looking their best well before the pageant.

FINALLY, P-DAY ARRIVED, and X packed up her arsenal of beauty (which included additional rhinestones, Super Glue, bobby pins, needle, thread and Advil) and headed down to the Quincy Marriott. The competition unfolds on a Saturday night and all-day Sunday, and the routine is fairly standard: First come the Miss Teen Massachusetts USA contestants, wearing cocktail dresses, as they announce their names and hometowns (certain towns, like Bridgewater, seem to spawn more contestants than, say, Prides Crossing).

Next the Miss Massachusetts USA contenders are presented. Each group performs a dance number, and then the competition starts. The girls begin with the bathing suits, followed by the evening gowns. With a field of 43 contestants, the judges—most of whom regard the hopefuls with a straight face and a critical eye—need to separate the wheat from the chaff, and it looks like a daunting task.

X acquitted herself nicely, although I later learned that she walked the wrong way down the catwalk at one point, leading a whole crew of her competitors with her. Nevertheless, onstage everything appeared seamless. The girls smiled their absolute brightest (though X regretted not trying the Vaseline-on-the-teeth trick, seeing as her lips stuck to them from smiling incessantly) and posed in their patented pageant stance: one hand on hip, leg slightly bent, chest thrust out and up, and stomach sucked in. The swimsuit competition is every heterosexual teen boy's fantasy, and the evening gown portion is like a fashion show by a designer who's inordinately fond of sequins and bugle beads.

THE JUDGES APPLY A CRITICAL EYE.

Backstage, however, is a different story. According to X, as soon as they were finished with the opening number, the heels came off, and it was a 40-yard dash to get to the other end of a huge room, across the hallway and into their swimsuits. Surprisingly, though, there's little of the catty bitchery one might expect in such an estrogen feeding frenzy.

"Believe it or not, all the girls were fantastic and couldn't have been more helpful to or complimentary of each other," X says.

Throughout this time, Y was off chain-smoking, while Z was constantly on his cell phone, texting X advice and encouragement. And because of his expertise, on Sunday afternoon, X was chosen as one of 12 semifinalists.

Given that X had a huge cheering section, I was surprised (and a bit outraged) when she didn't make it into the top-five finalists. All that hard work, and it was over in what seemed like an instant. We met her in the hotel bar, where she kept chanting, "Pizza and beer," with a dazed, faraway look in her eye.

But even after busting her hump for something that began essentially as a lark, she remains resolutely upbeat. "I couldn't have been happier with the experience," she says. "Unless, of course, I was wearing a crown right now." Believe it or not, X is thinking about competing again. Y and Z, however, aren't sure their nerves can take it. ✖✖✖

Once in a Lost Generation

Go to the Green Light Instead of curling up with a good book and a cup of tea, get cozy at the American Repertory Theater's six-hour, tour-de-force performance of Gatz. In the show, running Jan. 7–Feb. 7, an office worker reads F. Scott Fitzgerald's The Great Gatsby aloud, in its entirety, with no cuts and no additions. Strange things start happening, blurring the line between the novel and the play. Presented over two days or in two segments with two intermissions, including a dinner break, it's a great way to spend a cold winter's night. Adriana Stimola

Avatar ★ ½ Twelve years and some $400 million later, James Cameron's latest opus lands with a thud. Sure, you can admire the 3-D presentation, performance-capture technique and computer animation. (If you're not already impressed enough, characters keep elbowing you in the ribs, a reminder that you're watching something amazing.) This is groundbreaking, next-level technology, and I was bored out of my damn mind. Looking like a tacky airbrush painting, Avatar is CGI eye candy by way of prog-rock album covers with an absence of characterization and an abundance of corny dialogue. Unabashedly ripping off Terrence Malick's The New World, Kevin Costner's Dances With Wolves and his own Aliens, Cameron sends Sam Worthington's crippled space marine to a distant planet to reenact a banal white-guy-saves-the-natives fantasy. It feels recycled, rehashed and more like an F/X demo reel than an actual movie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Blind Side ★ The inspirational true story of the Baltimore Ravens' Michael Oher becomes one of the year's most inadvertently offensive movies, thanks to Sandra Bullock's rampaging ego and the kind of unconscious racism Hollywood does better than anyone else. Oher, the troubled son of a crack addict, spent much of his childhood homeless before being adopted by a rich, white family who kindly helped him fulfill his potential. But instead of focusing on Oher's moving struggle, The Blind Side spends two hours inviting us to worship the selflessness of his new mom, played by Bullock as an amalgamation of Julia Roberts' least appealing qualities. She fires off sassy one-liners in endless glamour shots, while the rest of the cast nods approvingly and tells us how great she is. Oher, played by Quinton Aaron, is given no thoughts of his own. He just thanks her profusely and does what he's told. This isn't a movie about adopting a son; it's about adopting a pet. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Crazy Heart ★★ ½ In his best performance since The Big Lebowski, Jeff Bridges stars as a washed-up, alcoholic country singer touring lousy Southwestern dive bars. Scott Cooper's debut feature initially boasts a grungy authenticity, but just when you think Crazy Heart is on its way to being The Wrestler of country music, a banal redemption formula kicks in and sends the whole film reeling off into inspirational TV-movie land. The too-young Maggie Gyllenhaal proves an improbable love interest for Bridges' seedy troubadour, and (an excellent) Colin Farrell drops by as a former protégé who makes success look far too easy. The grim, admirable desolation of the film's early passages is quickly abandoned for garden-variety uplift and clichéd rehab scenes. The late-game addition of Robert Duvall as a curmudgeonly AA aficionado only adds to the phoniness. These brave performances deserved better. (At Boston Common and Kendall Square.)

An Education ★★ ½ In what's sure to be Roman Polanski's favorite film of the year, dazzling newcomer Carey Mulligan stars as a 16-year-old schoolgirl who falls under the sway of Peter Sarsgaard's suave 30-something hepcat in gloomy, postwar Britain. Adapted by novelist Nick Hornby from Lynn Barber's memoir, the movie takes a tender look back at statutory rape as a rite of passage, and it's a testament to some fine performances that the film only feels icky in retrospect. There's nobody better than Hornby at dissecting all the ways people like to define themselves through their tastes and fascinations, but in nearly every other respect, his screenplay is too fussy and neat for its own good. This is a very polite, middlebrow view of what must've actually been an extremely messy affair. Director Lone Scherfig keeps everything humming pleasantly along, with even the inevitable betrayals and recriminations occurring at a genteel pitch. It's as if all the characters are afraid to raise their voices. The feel-good final reel is almost unforgivable. (At Kendall Square and Waltham Embassy.)

Everybody's Fine ★ ½ In this ill-advised remake of Giuseppe Tornatore's 1990 tear-jerker, Robert De Niro does his worst Robin Williams impression as he hunches his shoulders, raises his eyebrows and stares mawkishly into the distance, all to indicate just how awfully sad and pathetic he is. As a recent widower seeking to reconnect with his estranged children, DeNiro takes a variety of buses and trains, eventually meeting up with brittle Kate Beckinsale, elusive Sam Rockwell and the ever-effusive Drew Barrymore. For starters, we're supposed to buy that this disparate collection of actors came from the same gene pool. Even

SUPER SLEUTH

Guy Ritchie brings action and bromance to the Victorian era.

Sherlock Holmes ★★★½
Starring Robert Downey Jr., Jude Law, Rachel McAdams and Mark Strong. Screenplay by Michael Robert Johnson, Anthony Peckham and Simon Kinberg. Directed by Guy Ritchie. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

ON PAPER IT SOUNDS terrifying: a reimagining of Sir Arthur Conan Doyle's iconic detective under the auspices of Madonna's ex-husband, also known for making crappy gangster movies. I know I was worried. (I haven't even bothered to see a Guy Ritchie film since his 2002 Madge-induced vanity project Swept Away, and this happens to be my job.)

But Sherlock Holmes turns out to be the most pleasant surprise I've had at the theater since Star Trek. Folks who grew up on the

tweedy elegance of Basil Rathbone's 1940s B-movies are probably going to quibble with Ritchie's presentation of Holmes as a loutish, bare-knuckle-brawling manic-depressive.

Granted, I haven't read Doyle's books since junior high, but wasn't Holmes a drug-addicted slob lacking social graces? Further research may be required, but I doubt this particular interpretation is that far off the original.

Ritchie's 1891 London is a steampunk hellhole where Downey's dissipated Holmes shacks up with Jude Law's fussy Dr. Watson and disappears into long, potentially suicidal benders whenever they don't have a case to crack. Alas, Watson's out to ruin their besotted living arrangement, proposing marriage to the lovely Mary (Kelly Reilly) and inciting all sorts of abandonment issues within the dysfunctional detective's broken heart.

Meanwhile, an old case is reopened. Black-magic practitioner and all-around royal weirdo Lord Blackwood (Mark Strong) somehow survived his death by hanging, and he's now angling to reclaim the American colonies with the help of a little superstitious mumbo jumbo, a terrorized populace and maybe even some chemical weapons.

Disturbing the already troubled emotional waters is the reemergence of Irene Adler. Fetchingly played by Rachel McAdams, faithful readers will remember her from "A Scandal in Bohemia" as the only woman who ever outsmarted the hypercerebral Holmes. These days she's working for an unseen Professor Moriarty, and I can only presume that the great lengths Ritchie and company go to conceal his face are because they want to cast a giant star to play the villain in the inevitable sequel.

These guys have the easy, bristling chemistry of an old married couple.

Sherlock Holmes is a bratty, funny movie. It's jaunty, quick-witted and, unlike Ritchie's other pictures, light on its feet. So often in action movies brainpower is synonymous with weakness, but the script works overtime to present intelligence as just another form of bad-assery, with Holmes often using his encyclopedic knowledge of human anatomy to fell foes twice his size. Our newfangled Holmes doesn't win fights because he's bigger and brawnier—he wins because he's smarter. I can get behind that kind of message.

As usual, Downey Jr. is delightful. He's effortlessly charismatic and flip, but he spins on a dime into aching vulnerability, muttering devastating put-downs to everyone within earshot before looking upon Law and McAdams with the neediness of a wounded puppy. Downey's Holmes is a tormented genius with emotions too big for the room and a brain too big for his head. No wonder he's wasted most of the time.

Law's career didn't quite work out the way we hoped, but he makes a marvelous Watson. Most treatments of Watson lapse into buffoonery, but here he's sharp as a tack and quick with a blade, always one step behind Holmes but two steps ahead of the audience. These guys have the easy, bristling chemistry of an old married couple, and the biggest lull in Sherlock Holmes comes when the screenplay keeps them apart for too long. McAdams and Reilly are just window dressing for the real love story here.

Did I care about Lord Blackwood's master plan? Not really. Nor did I care about Liam Neeson in Batman Begins, Eric Bana in Star Trek or whoever that guy was in Casino Royale. As in those pictures, the great pleasure of Sherlock Holmes is the joy of watching familiar heroes be reborn. ✖✖✖ worse, we're invited in on a conspiracy as nobody dares tell him the bad family news, despite the fact that he keeps showing up on their doorsteps. Waking Ned Devine writer/director Kirk Jones overplays the schmaltz, squandering his talented supporting cast on silly soap-opera revelations and some genuinely terrible digital cinematography. Everybody's Fine is a crappier version of About Schmidt. (In the suburbs.)

Fantastic Mr. Fox ★★★ ½ Writer/director Wes Anderson's fastidious, sometimes suffocating, attention to costume detail and production design make his movies feel like they're taking place in dollhouses, so it makes sense that he would work with puppets. Rendered in hand-crafted, stop-motion animation, this marvelous adaptation of the Roald Dahl story may look like one of those Rankin-Bass holiday specials from the 1970s, but it still feels like a Wes Anderson film. It's got the filmmaker's dysfunctional family pathos and droll hipster humor, only with woodland animals instead of actors. George Clooney voices the title character, a reformed chicken-thief turned newspaper columnist itching to return to his criminal roots. His antics stoke the ire of three nasty farmers, and Mr. Fox and family find themselves on the run. Boasting bone-dry vocal turns from Meryl Streep, Jason Schwartzman and Bill Murray, the movie feels like a summation of Anderson's career thus far, with certain scenes lifted almost directly from The Royal Tenenbaums and The Life Aquatic with Steve Zissou. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Invictus ★★★ For such a straightforward, often clumsy crowd-pleaser, Clint Eastwood's latest still feels like a marvel of restraint. Indeed, Invictus is an exercise in doing less with more. Recently elected Nelson Mandela (Morgan Freeman) seeks to reconcile a deeply divided South Africa by rallying the public behind their largely white rugby team, which had long been considered a symbol of institutionalized racism. Like Eastwood's Flags of Our Fathers, Invictus is about how cynical, insincere political calculations are often necessary to serve the greater good. Eastwood's not great at shooting sports, but he gets a sly, complicated performance out of Freeman, and there's some predictably fine, understated work from Matt Damon as the team captain. This should've been the hokiest movie ever made, but Eastwood plays it quietly and close to the vest. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

It's Complicated ★★★ There's such a lightness to Meryl Streep's work these days—even in something as wretched as Mamma Mia!—that she seems to be having the time of her life. Same goes for Alec Baldwin, whose middle-aged paunch has unleashed his inner comedian. Writer/director Nancy Meyers honestly doesn't have to do much besides put these dynamos together and let them riff. Playing a couple that's been divorced for a decade, Streep and Baldwin drunkenly hook up the night before their son's college graduation and spend the rest of the movie negotiating the horny aftershocks. Baldwin's remarried to a bitchy younger woman (Lake Bell, harshly photographed to give Streep the advantage) while Meryl finds herself in a tentative courtship with Steve Martin's sensitive architect. Like most Myers movies, this one wallows uncomfortably in ostentatious displays of wealth. But there's no denying the giddy chemistry between Streep and Baldwin. They're both having so much fun it's contagious. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Mixed Feelings

Meryl Streep and Alec Baldwin have giddy chemistry in It's Complicated.

Me and Orson Welles ★★ ½ The problem here is the "me." Adapted from Robert Kaplow's novel about the founding of the Mercury Theatre in 1937, loosey-goosey director Richard Linklater's latest film finds the least interesting avenue possible into a fascinating story. While young prodigy Welles (played with brilliant, boozy bombast by Christian McKay) struggles with his soon-to-be legendary stage revision of Julius Caesar, Linklater's picture chooses to focus on the romantic travails of a bit player, a role assumed with no discernible charisma by teenage heartthrob Zac Efron. Will Claire Danes' unspeakably boring secretary deign to deflower young Zac? And does anyone care that Welles is about to kick-start his career? Linklater seems to sense our ambivalence, as a gigantic chunk of the movie is devoted to replicating Welles' landmark production, with plenty of room for the uncanny James Tupper as Joseph Cotten. Me and Orson Welles often plays like 1930s fan-fiction, with Efron's tedious drama occasionally interrupting the story. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

The Men Who Stare at Goats ★★ ½ Half-formed comedic conceits spray like buckshot across director Grant Heslov's disappointingly cartoonish adaptation of Jon Ronson's exposé on the madness of military psych-ops. Ewan McGregor, who narrates every damn moment of the film, plays a depressed reporter following George Clooney's possibly insane ex-soldier into Baghdad during the early days of the Iraq War. On the road, Clooney tells a tale of the New Earth Army, a top-secret unit that attempted to train cadets in the paranormal arts. Believe it or not, most of this stuff is true. Unfortunately, Heslov's direction cheapens the material by going for broad buffoonery and slapstick where precision is required. Jeff Bridges recycles too many Dude-isms as a hippie squad leader, while Kevin Spacey tiresomely twirls his moustache as a cardboard villain. Everybody's mugging for the camera, but Clooney almost saves the film singlehandedly. Deftly deadpanning outrageous monologues, he plays it straight and sad, improbably getting us invested in this silliness. (In the suburbs.)

Nine ★ Rob Marshall is back with a desultory take on Federico Fellini's 8 ½, and it's a travesty. Much like Marshall's pitifully unimaginative adaptation of Chicago, Nine is a musical for people who hate musicals, again confining the singing and dancing numbers to a black soundstage that exists only in the imagination—because God forbid anybody burst into song in a musical. Fellini's playfully sad reverie has been adapted by Michael Tolkin and the late Anthony Minghella, two desperately serious screenwriters who make the fatal mistake of treating a comic predicament as the stuff of grand tragedy. Daniel Day-Lewis might be our greatest living actor, but he couldn't possibly be more wrong for this role, replacing Marcello Mastroianni's debauched delight with angst, hand-wringing and temper tantrums. He also seems about as Italian as a shepherd's pie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Paranormal Activity ★ Don't believe the hype. This $15,000 cheapie drew some fleeting attention at festivals a couple years ago and now arrives on a tsunami of tweets thanks to a massive, cynical marketing campaign from Paramount Pictures. Purporting to be the found home video footage of a spectacularly uninteresting couple (Katie Featherson and Micah Sloat), the movie chronicles Katie's troubles with a vaguely defined, undead stalker. This is the laziest, most annoying demon in recent film. What passes for scares involve the creature clomping around the attic like an annoying upstairs neighbor, or every once in awhile turning on the lights in an empty room. Nothing here is novel or even remotely believable. Filmmaker Oren Peli doesn't seem to understand that everyone already saw The Blair Witch Project 10 years ago. The closing shot provides one genuinely great jolt, and it turns out that was only recently added by Steven Spielberg. (In the suburbs.)

The Road ★★ If you've read Cormac McCarthy's Pulitzer-Prize–winning novel, you're probably wondering how it could possibly lend itself to a satisfying adaptation. The relentlessly grim tale of a man and his young son wandering through a post-apocalyptic wasteland, McCarthy's book is a collection of unsettling anecdotes lacking the kind of forward momentum that movies require. Rendered faithfully here by director John Hillcoat, The Road is a miserable slog through an ashen, ruined landscape, punctuated by random attacks from redneck cannibals. Viggo Mortensen stars as the father, appearing emaciated and ill, reciting chunks of the novel's prose in voiceover. Charlize Theron appears briefly in flashback as the mother, fleshing out a couple scenes McCarthy only suggested. Hillcoat supplies images of magnificent desolation, but it's still a hopeless dirge with no variation in tone. A guy and his kid pushing a shopping cart toward certain doom worked on the page, but the film leaves an audience with no point of entry. One note played well is still only one note. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

A Serious Man ★★★★ Grappling with mysteries on a deceptively mundane stage, the latest gem from Joel and Ethan Coen is about the silence of God. Set in a Minneapolis suburb circa 1967, the film stars Michael Stuhlbarg as a college physics professor and human doormat whose entire life begins to crumble one day with the kind of one-thing-after-another momentum that the Coens typically apply to their crime pictures. It's The Book of Job according to a couple of wisenheimer skeptics. Larry's search for celestial explanation leads him up the hierarchy of local rabbis in a series of agonizingly funny and fruitless counseling sessions and rambling parables. As usual, the Coens are being dismissed in some circles as snickering, nihilistic yuksters. But such a reading willfully ignores A Serious Man's deliberately open-ended, questioning structure. In the end, do any of us really have any choice but to accept the mystery? (In the suburbs.)

2012 ★★ With films like Independence Day, Godzilla and The Day After Tomorrow under his belt, director Roland Emmerich obviously has a hankering for mass destruction. With a plot based on the Mayan calendar's prediction of an apocalypse, this is his silliest fetishization of annihilation yet. John Cusack stars as a failed sci-fi writer and deadbeat dad who somehow finds time to patch things up with his family while speeding through earthquakes and outrunning flowing volcanoes. Danny Glover plays the sad sack president charged with preserving civilization as his pragmatic aide (Oliver Platt) butts heads with Chiwetel Ejiofor's idealistic scientist. If there's anything harrowing about hundreds of millions of people dying horrible deaths, this cheerfully tasteless movie doesn't dwell on it. Instead we get some plucky heroics, garish stereotypes and one extremely lucky dog. Most of the world perishes, but at least Cusack's daughter learns to stop wetting the bed. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Twilight Saga: New Moon ★ And you thought the first one was terrible? This second installment of Stephenie Meyer's awful ode to sexual repression is so glum, dreary and snail-paced, it feels like it plays in slow-motion. Pining, as always, for sparkly vampire Edward Cullen (Robert Pattinson, still looking vaguely embarrassed to be here), Kristen Stewart's depressed Bella pouts, whines and stares off into space a lot. With Edward out of the picture for most of the running time, she tries to distract herself with the happy, shirtless visage of Taylor Lautner's Jacob. But Bella has rotten luck with boys, as every guy who takes a shine to her seems to end up being some sort of supernatural beast. Though his waxed chest might lead you to believe otherwise, Jacob is actually a werewolf, and so we suffer through more of Meyer's lame mythology and lots of annoying emo posturing. It takes an awfully long time for nothing to happen in New Moon. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Up in the Air ★★★ ½ Director Jason Reitman's sturdy, crowd-pleasing adaptation of Walter Kirn's novel is best when it allows George Clooney to subtly toy with and deconstruct his tabloid persona. Clooney stars as a blissfully single corporate tool who spends 300 days a year flying from town to town, firing folks whenever their cowardly bosses need to outsource the axing. Streamlined, efficient and preaching a gospel of "no luggage," Clooney meets his match in Vera Farmiga's randy road warrior and finds himself forced to rethink his philosophy when Anna Kendrick's up-and-coming protégée threatens his way of life. It's slick, classy entertainment, more beholden to Billy Wilder than Judd Apatow. Reit-man's occasional bouts of glibness are no match for Clooney's seemingly effortless, soul-searching work. The handsome bastard is able to suggest sudden, midlife bouts of yearning without making a big show of it. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Where the Wild Things Are ★★★ ½ There's an almost unbearable undertow of melancholy in director Spike Jonze's arty adaptation of Maurice Sendak's 1963 picture book. It's an extraordinarily subjective experience, burrowing so deeply into the child's perspective that the movie works as a Rorschach test for viewers. Some are left completely cold, others in tears. Count me in the latter camp. Drawing out Sendak's sparse sentences to feature length, Jonze and his coscreenwriter Dave Eggers sketch the unhappy world of young Max (Max Records) with swiftness and clarity. Max is a lonely, angry child of divorce, who one night retreats into his imagination, where he becomes king of a wild band of beasts. Each of these marvelous, towering Muppets represents an aspect of Max's troubled home life, and their nonsensical games encompass the gamut of childhood anxieties, with petty jealousies and temper tantrums always circling back around to a gnawing fear of abandonment. It's not a perfect film, but I doubt something so raw and deeply felt ever could be. (In the suburbs.)

FORGING ON

Anvil rides rock-doc glory to an offbeat experience as headliner.

Anvil
plays House of Blues Jan. 16.

Brent Craig

ROCK HEADLINERS HAVE traditionally booked other bands to warm up the crowd as an opening act. It's unusual to show a feature-length movie instead. But that's what metal survivors Anvil are doing with Anvil! The Story of Anvil, a widely acclaimed documentary about the pitfalls and perseverance of that Canadian band.

"Really, you couldn't get a better opening act," singer-guitarist Steve "Lips" Kudlow says of the film, which will be screened before his group's Jan. 16 set at House of Blues. The movie has become Anvil's calling card,

drawing praise from film festivals, celebrities and fellow musicians. AC/DC invited Anvil to play as its opening act at Gillette Stadium last summer.

The backstory: Anvil was on the rise in the early '80s, opening stadium bills in Europe and influencing such groups as Metallica, Slayer and Guns N' Roses (whose members give testimonial in the film) with its thrash-metal prototype. But Anvil fell off the radar, derailed by bad management. Rather than give up though, Kudlow and co-founding drummer Robb Reiner spent the next 25 years recording and performing in near-obscurity.

"It's really a movie about human spirit," Kudlow, 53, says from his Toronto home. "It's not really about heavy metal. Robb and I could have been two pyramid builders who have been building this pyramid for our entire lives, and here somebody did a movie about finishing it up, to put the last blocks on top."

That "somebody" was Sacha Gervasi, a screenwriter who penned The Terminal for Steven Spielberg. Gervasi had met Anvil at age 15 when he snuck into London's Marquee Club. He later served as an Anvil roadie. "We took him to all these smaller hockey arenas all over Quebec and Ontario," says Kudlow, noting that when he and Reiner were teens, "To have been asked out on the road with one of our favorite bands would have blown us away."

Ross Halfin

Payback came 20 years later when Gervasi suddenly got back in touch, surprised that Anvil was still toughing it out, and proposed making a documentary. "I became extraordinarily emotional because I could see how my entire past brought me to that point," Kudlow says. "I could see my destiny, that my entire career was for the purpose of this movie–and really had a purpose."

Anvil! The Story of Anvil shows the band members at home (where Kudlow delivers food for a catering company in the Toronto cold) and on a disastrous tour of Europe where they grapple with club managers and scant crowds. It's like the mockumentary This is Spinal Tap with a real band. But Kudlow, who counters that "Spinal Tap is the fake Anvil," remains the optimist through it all.

"There's no sense in living regrets, and the journey itself is actually the most valuable part," he says. "If you have a day job, at least I'm going to have something in my life that brings me enjoyment."

Now the day job is behind him, and Anvil (rounded out by bassist Glenn Five) has embarked on its first U.S. tour in more than a decade. In addition to Anvil! The Story of Anvil (also on DVD), the band is supporting This Is Thirteen, recorded during the film with Chris Tsangarides, who produced Anvil's 1982 classic Metal on Metal. He and the group also rerecorded that album's title track and "666" for the Rock Band video game.

Kudlow doesn't seem to worry whether non-metal fans who see the film or catch Anvil live out of curiosity will continue to attend shows or actually buy the records.

"It's not like we've crossed over musically, but we've crossed over emotionally, and that's a completely different level," he says. "You look out at people, and the way they're looking at you has a warmth to it that I've never witnessed in all my years. It's not like a rock star onstage. It's like, 'There's Steve. Look at how he's enjoying himself. Let's cheer him on.'" ✖✖✖

Home-Punk Heroes

Hats Off, Ear Plugs In There was a time in the late '70s and early '80s when Boston was head-over-post-punk-heels for Mission of Burma. The band's brief career skyrocketed them to local fame, but their sudden breakup (due to guitarist Roger Miller developing a serious hearing condition) left people wanting more. Ripped with unconventional time signatures, anathematic choruses and a healthy dose of noise, MOB's songs have been covered by artists from R.E.M to Moby, and they remain one of the genre's most influential groups. Reunited in 2002 and back on tour, they perform at the Paradise Rock Club on Jan. 15 and 16. Go hear a local legend. Adriana Stimola

Sealed With a Hershey's Kiss

Cocoa Loco

Dark, hot, truffled, filled with bacon... chocolate comes in many forms these days. Anthony Sammarco, author of The Baker Chocolate Company: A Sweet History, tracks the evolution of the sought-after snack in an illustrated discussion at the Boston Athenaeum on Jan. 7. Sammarco's lecture spans everything from Aztec chocolate to the bricks made locally in the 1700s. Your sweet tooth will be aching, so remember to bring a stash to ease the pain.

ATTENTION, BOUNTY HUNTERS! BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER EXTINGUISHING HIS CLOTHES AT THE GRASS-BURNING RITUAL OF WAKAKUSA YAMAYAKI, HELD JAN. 10 IN NARA, JAPAN

Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.

Monika Berotas took our Fall Dining issue to Vilnius, Lithuania, but it caused confusion with everyone wondering how you could cover food without featuring 187 variations on potatoes and cabbage.

Denise McDonough and Anne Moran visited Safed, Israel, a center of Kabbalah. Behind them, Madonna posed to promote her upcoming "Elderly Jewish Mystic Tour."

Emi and Eri Morita went to Tokyo, Japan's giant Tsukiji fish market, where they marveled at some of the world's rarest aquatic species, before and after deboning.

Former White House Chief of Staff Andrew Card is happy to be reading "The Improper" instead of "New Yorker" articles on George Bush's legacy.

We salute Boston's finest restaurants and clubs

The Gramercy Park Roll is a favorite at Haru

RESTAURANTS

FUGAKYU [1280 Beacon Street (Coolidge Corner), Brookline, MA 02446, 617-734-1268, www.fugakyu.net] Authentic Japanese cuisine in an elegant and serene setting. Open Daily for lunch and dinner, Fugakyu's menu consists of traditional and nouveau Japanese cuisine including sushi, sashimi, tempura and an extensive sake list. Fugakyu is the largest Japanese restaurant in New England. It's two floors include a sushi bar, cocktail bar, common dining areas, bamboo-enclosed booths, screened Tatami rooms and several private function rooms. Reservations for parties of all sizes are accepted. Takeout and delivery available.

HARU [55 Huntington Ave., Boston, 617-536-0770, www.harusushi.com] Haru is a modern Japanese restaurant group known for its ample portions and striking designs. Located street level below the Shops at Prudential Center, Haru serves inventive Japanese cuisine ranging from sushi, sashimi and creative salads to signature dishes like ceviches, tartares, filet mignon and specialty rolls. The 6,100 sq. ft. space boasts a striking private dining room, elegant sushi bar, and lively bar and lounge scene perfect for people-watching. Catering and delivery also available.

L'ANDANA [86 Cambridge Street, Burlington, 781-270-0100, www.landanagrill.com] L'Andana will transport you to the foothills of Tuscany. The restaurant spins the rustic look of an old world farmhouse into a modern interpretation of the faraway countryside. Chef Jamie Mammano and Executive Chef Robert Jean work together to create cuisine that is equally fresh, authentic and contemporary Italian as well as featuring a selection of items from a wood grill. Full bar, extensive wine list, complimentary valet parking, and a striking private dining room are welcome amenities. Dinner Sunday-Saturday.

MASA RESTAURANT [439 Tremont Street, Boston, 617-338-8884 and 350 Cambridge Road, Woburn, 781-938-8886, www.masarestaurant.com] Masa's two locations offer an award winning menu, pairing flavors of the Southwest with local ingredients. ARE YOU SHAPED MORE LIKE AN APPLE THAN A PEAR?

If you are a non-smoker and a bit thick around the middle (waist equal to or greater than 40 inches for men and 35 inches for women), you may be eligible to participate in a research study investigating the effect of an experimental medicine that lowers fat levels in the blood. We will test whether lowering the fat levels in the blood improves blood vessel function. The study requires an initial 1-hour screening visit, two 20-minute visits (to pick up study medicine) and two 6-hour visits over 6-10 weeks. Compensation up to $400 and validation of parking expenses or reimbursement for public transportation costs for study visits will be provided. For more information, please call the Brigham & Women's Hospital Vascular Medicine Research Center at (617) 732-6320.

RIDING HIGH

Big Wheels

You know how you always dread your company holiday party, but then you go, and it's entertaining on so many levels?

That's like the Rodman Ride for Kids Gala, held at the Seaport World Trade Center. A fabulous feast, holiday shopping, dancing and merriment (e.g., bartenders with generous elbows)... what's not to like?

The benefit (which raises major money for various children's charities) attracted a motley yet melodious assortment of do-gooders, including the evening's namesake benefactor, über-philanthropist Don Rodman, laugh-riot Steve Sweeney, radio and TV smoothie Billy Costa, WBZ bloodhound Peg Rusconi, restaurateurs like Steve DeFelippo of Davio's and celebrity chefs like Marc Orfaly of Pigalle (serving up delicious grub), pro-sports merchandising mogul Josh Fink and his conchita, Anita, DJ/designer Paul Ferraro, sales vixen Corey Bradley, bombshell Elizabeth Lascaze and her hottie husband, Christopher Smith, dance predator Amelia Sutton, flavor of the month Justin Breton, the Willy Wonka of the party world Michael Nedeau, zany philanthropists Lynne and Gary Smith, Donald Trump confidante Michael Tarshi and pretty much every board member of Raising a Reader, including powerhouse Josefina Bonilla.

There was the woman who said, "I just won my auction item," with less enthusiasm than might be expected. When asked why, she explained, "Now I have to go tell my husband."

But the evening's funniest comment came when a hipper-than-thou club kid commented, "Ninety-five percent of these people have never heard this song, which is a good thing. The bad thing is that they're dancing."

Know Thyself

How many homosexuals does it take to fill up an apartment-building lobby? Apparently, a bunch, but as one guest put it when someone remarked on the packed space, "That makes it easier to rub up against people."

For its kick-off party, the Boston chapter of GLAAD (the Gay and Lesbian Alliance Against Defamation) threw a cocktail soiree in the lobby of FP3, and lots and lots of people showed up.

Among them: the organization's head honcho Jarrett Barrios, his husband, Doug Hattaway, Somerpuddlian Tom Witkowski, silver fox

> He perused the good-looking guys in the room, saying, "It's always good to be aware of the current inventory."

Dean Hara, the tall, blond and handsome John Koss, budding entrepreneur Peter Dziedzic (flying solo because his hubby was out of town), the delightful Richard Moore, fashionista Jay Calderin and his kilt-wearing other half, Rob Frye, and the man who said, "Only one bartender at a gay event?!? What were they thinking?"

However, the cattiest comment came from the guest who was spoken for but still perused the good-looking guys in the room, saying, "It's always good to be aware of the current inventory."

But Soft, What Party at Yonder Bar Doth Rock?

Quick! Name the only Shakespeare play whose title begins and ends with a vowel.

That was the trivia question posed to the sparkly crew who turned out at Ivy for Commonwealth Shakespeare Company's holiday party.

The better-than-average–looking crowd included artsy types and those who support them like board member Peg McFeeley-Golden, spa magnate Tony Liquori, distractingly handsome actors Tim Eliot and Dan Roach, stunning redhead Allie Duhamel, the breathtaking Rebekah Maggor, jack-of-all-trades Ryan Maxwell, PR czar Tony Fusco, super-architect William Rawn, the hale and hearty Will Lyman, real estate mack daddy Tony Pangaro and oodles of interesting others.

There was food. There was drink. There was a blessed minimum of blah-blah-blahing and no shortage of holiday cheer. Even the waiters were smiling (but then again, sometimes it's easy to confuse them with actors).

Oh, and by the way: If you guessed Othello, you know what CSC will be performing on the Boston Common this summer. ✖✖✖

How Mature

I got married at a vineyard, and my husband enrolled me in a wine studies program for my 30th birthday. In other words, I like my pinot noir. Or I did. Following my son's birth, nothing seemed to suit my taste.

I pose the perfect challenge for today's merchants, an enthusiastic group bringing new grape varieties and regions into the mainstream. "They're transforming our collective palate and moving the industry forward," explains Master of Wine Sandy Block, who explores the current trends this issue.

We turn to another expert, WEEI's Michael Holley, for the cover story on Rajon Rondo. Holley chats with the Celtics star about his coachability and his future plans. "Hopefully, I'll have at least a couple more rings," he says.

It's the kind of talk that makes Bostonians want to raise a glass. I recommend some monastrell from Spain. It's my latest obsession, thanks to my corner wine shop.

SIP SERVICE

SARAH DIBARI, 29, WAS a premed student at Tufts when her career took an enviable turn. "I was hired to wait tables at Excelsior," says DiBari, the wine director at Mooo steakhouse. "And I volunteered to help them fill in their glass wine tower." It was her first introduction to a wider, delicious world, and she abandoned dreams of grad school to plunge into the cellar. At Mooo, she runs her program with an adventurous touch: "My favorite thing is to have someone say, 'I usually drink this for $100,' and sell them something for $60 that blows their minds." Even so, at home DiBari drinks whites. "I taste so many reds during the day." ANDREW RIMAS

Good Eats

A Meaty Matter

Just like the original JP location, Ten Tables in Cambridge shows a flair for rustic French fare—and a knack for all things forcemeat-related. Charcuterie headlines the appetizers, and chef/coproprietor David Punch has added cassoulet to the winter menu. Tender morsels of Hudson Valley moulard duck confit, duBretton pork shoulder and a link of house-made garlic sausage mix with velvety cannellini beans in this staple from Southern France.

ELIZABETH BOMZE

In the Lab

NO STAIN, NO GAIN

A decent wine spill can ruin an entire outfit, and in turn, an entire night. Unless you're partying with Tide spokesperson Kelly Ripa, you probably won't have immediate access to patented stain fighters. We tested pantry staples to see what works in times of desperation.

TAKE THE AKA TRAIN

From Uni to Lincoln

FOR LINCOLN SUBURBANITES, it's an unexpected and welcome gift: a promising new restaurant next to the town train station. It's newsworthy for urbanites, too. Slated to open March 15, AKA Bistro is a collaboration between Chris Chung, long-time sashimi chef at Uni, and Christian Touche, general manager at Clio since it opened in 1998.

"The concept is French, traditional, country-style bistro cuisine—boeuf bourguignon, blanquette de veau—and sashimi like we have at Uni," Touche says. More casual and casually priced than Clio and Uni, AKA's starters will range from $7–$18 with entrées mostly in the twenties, "with room for extremes," he adds. AKA has a wine-and-beer license.

OVER IN CAMBRIDGE, Inman Square's East Coast Grill is prepping to celebrate its 25th anniversary. "We're proud we've made it this long," chef/owner Chris Schlesinger says. Although much has stayed the same over the last quarter-century—"the tenets of the food, the equatorial influences"—Schlesinger notes that ECG was initially meat-oriented, eventually shifting its focus to seafood. Stay tuned for special events: "In the spring, we'll do some original menus," he says.

NOW FOR SOME HOUSEKEEPING: In Needham Center, the train station that housed Fava Restaurant will soon be reborn as the Center Cafe.... And a good source tells us Olecito will be operating in Brookline Village by the end of January, although its owners aren't spilling the beans.

Going Out

In the Right Direction

Internet updates on Phillip Tang's plans and pedigree had local foodies all atwitter with thoughts of hand-rolled noodles and whole local pigs. The slightest hint of soup dumplings sent them spiraling off on David Chang tangents. "I'll be my own person, but I can think of worse people to be compared to," says Tang, 27.

At East by Northeast in Cambridge, Tang's food will reflect both his experience in local kitchens like TW Food and Hungry Mother, and the Northern Chinese dim sum of his folks' place in Virginia. "Northern China is the breadbasket, and Southern China is the rice bowl," Tang shorthands. "The food tends to be heartier and stronger with garlic. There's lots of preservation techniques to make it through the cold winters."

Showcasing his style, the restaurant features small plates like pickled daikon, beet and rutabaga ($5) and a spicy beef broth ($10) based on his parents' recipe but adapted to use root vegetables. By twisting his influences, Tang hopes to present plates that touch on both the new and the familiar. "Especially in Boston, I feel like the Northern Chinese diet is very similar," he explains. "In the cold, I want to eat a bowl of noodles, and I think other people do, too."

Wine

Big Red

We all deserve to splurge sometimes, and if not during the long winter, then when? It's only money, right? Even if you didn't get a bonus, nothing fits the seasonal mood better than a powerful red wine, and fortunately the best have fallen a bit in price. For collectors, it's an auspicious time to buy, while the rest of us have our pick of bottles that were just rumors a few years ago.

Master of Wine Sandy Block is vice president of beverage operations for Legal Sea Foods.

Emiliana "Coyam" Rapel Valley, Chile, 2005 ($34, BRIX, BOSTON)
One of those scary-good wines, this is a blend produced by South America's largest certified-organic producer. It's a masterful, hand-crafted mix of syrah, cabernet sauvignon, merlot, carmenère and petit verdot, fermented with natural yeasts and aged 12 months in oak barrels. But none of this explains why you have to buy this blend. It's the lush, molten chocolate; the smoky tobacco-herb and delicate floral aroma; and the juicy blackberry but leathery flavors. It's about the contradictions. This wine will make you think. Or drool maybe.

Masi "Costasera" Amarone Classico Veneto, Italy, 2005 ($70, CIRACE, BOSTON)
If there's ever a wine that defined "vino da meditazione," this is it. You can't just drink this; you have to think about it. The way amarone is made—drying the grapes on bamboo racks until they become raisins, waiting for them to rot, fermenting for almost three months, then aging in barrels for two years—means this isn't something you gulp. It's rich and heady, with a balsamic, cherry, intensely spicy flavor. There's a hint of tomato paste and earthy minerality to round out the palate. Enjoy it with hard cheeses or at night in front of the fire.

Shafer Merlot Napa Valley, Calif., 2006 ($55, MARTY'S LIQUORS, ALLSTON)
Mind-blowing merlot? Don't laugh. This is what merlot is all about, the reason for our collective infatuation way back when, and no one this side of Pomerol does a better rendition than Shafer. It's velvety, juicy, with impressively fine-grained but subtle black-fruit flavors and a leaf-accented finish. The flavors go on and on, and then evolve into a toasty mocha finale that will make you swoon. This is a thrilling wine that will enhance any red meat dish. Just don't tell anyone it's merlot until after the first taste.

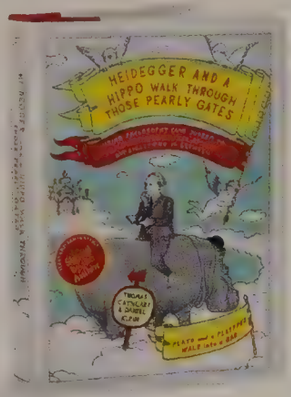
TIME OF YOUR LIFE



Laugh yourself to death!

AMAZINGLY, THAT DARKEST, saddest, scariest thing (death) becomes entertaining in the hands of these frisky philosophy-jokesters. Nicknaming Schopenhauer "The Schopster," calling Aristotle "Al" and loopily looping in another philosopher of gloom, Woody Allen, the authors discuss death with an imaginary student named Daryl. This "Schopey" sees death as the ultimate aim and purpose of life. Ouch!

But luckily he says we also have "a perverted will to live." There are shades of Buddhism, too; he believes the world is really just an illusion. Such heady and contradictory ideas run throughout the book. The notion of the immortal soul sometimes means that this hazy entity goes on and on. Alternatively, it may mean we "step off the wheel of birth and death" entirely, transcending individuality; this way Not-Me is Not-Dead. They quote Heidegger, who says that anticipating death brings on an "unshakable joy." To which our authors irreverently respond, "You've got another wack job on your hands, guys! Is he actually saying, 'Yippee Skippy. I will cease to exist forever more—hot damn!'?"

Heaven, that mysterious real estate in the sky, is represented sometimes like "wall-to-wall wispy smoky, cloudy stuff the departed can walk on." Or it may be "a Monet landscape peppered with Kmart art." The cartoons, many from The New Yorker, and the interspersed jokes, add their own dark joviality. ✖✖✖

Beauty

On a Streak

Color-streaked hair is the new black nail polish. But unlike an edgy mani, this latest punk trend can seem hard to pull off in professional settings. "People are trying to think of a way to hide it from their bosses, but if it's placed properly you don't have to hide it from anybody," suggests Kaitlyn Explosion, hair stylist and colorist at G2O Spa + Salon. "I try to steer people toward something a little more muted."

LINE UP Ashley Olsen rocks the blue streak.

Taking cues from Proenza Schouler's spring runway, I decide to go blue for a day. Too chicken to commit to a permanent streak, I buy a spray can from Dorothy's and opt for a DIY approach (not highly recommended). At first I feel self-conscious but soon forget about it. Slicked back into a ponytail, it even gets a couple of compliments. And the streak certainly beats those chunky blonde highlights. Even if I look slightly Smurfette.

TO THE NICE GIRL WHO GRADUATED FROM WELLESLEY IN '08, NOW WORKS IN CAMBRIDGE AND WAS ON A PLANE FROM CHICAGO TO BOSTON ON SUNDAY, NOV. 22:
You were in a taxi that got in an accident in Chicago (I hope that should be enough to narrow it down). I thought that we had a nice little conversation going, despite me being pretty awkward when I first meet an attractive girl. In fact, I was a little nervous, so if you read this, and you'd like to meet the more relaxed me, that would be awesome. I didn't want to get rejected in front of my friend who was across the aisle, so I never got around to asking for your number. So if this is you, or you know anyone that graduated [from] Wellesley in 2008 and works in Cambridge, please ask them what they think about taxis in Chicago. Missed connection

To car owners:
As winter creeps in, I realize that many car owners enjoy their remote car-starters. However, there are pedestrians walking by who know they are going to be stuck in the cold waiting for an overcrowded train. We are already envious. Sat with you at Walgreens in Arlington Heights on Sept. 22. You gave me your seat in the pharmacy area. You are a golfer—I was married to a golfer. You were holding a jar of peanuts, and I was teasing you. Would love to get together to resume our conversation. If you recognize yourself please e-mail me and tell me some things that you recall about me (vacation spot, what business my dad and ex are involved in), and I will know it is you. ellybear@comcast.net

BUT WINTER SUCKS! A glass of "Shouldn't Be Thinkin' About Spring"

Drink of the Moment

An Unlikely Pair

Impressing with wine is fairly easy. Plunk a bottle down on the table. Casually recite what you gleaned from the back label. Hope no one asks any questions. But that's for amateurs. To really dazzle drinkers, Clio bar manager Todd Maul demonstrates how even a dish like fried chicken can be enhanced by hooch.

First, consider whether the beverage will contrast or highlight the flavors of the chicken. For the former, Maul recommends the ↖ TENNESSEE, made with 3 ounces rye, 1 ounce maraschino liqueur and ½ ounce lemon juice. "I'm a big fan of rye with fried food, Old Overholt in particular, because it's sharper," he explains. "I'm a Tennessee fan because I like the drink by itself, it cleanses the palate and cuts through the grease."

For the opposite approach, Maul's ← SHOULDN'T BE THINKIN' ABOUT SPRING is a sweeter mouthful, while the 1½ ounces of Aperol (along with 1 ounce cachaça, 1 ounce ginger ale and ½ ounce lime juice) piques the appetite for feasting. "I thought the lemonade aspect of a Pimm's Cup would go well with fried chicken," Maul muses. "You think of fried chicken as kind of homey, and this is the kind of drink you would have on your back porch."

There's no talk of tannins. No bouquet of leather or clove. Rather, these cocktails evoke comforting images and bring camaraderie to the table. No matter what's for dinner, that's a welcome pairing.

Of all the daily specials rotating on Marjorie Druker's soup roster—satiny artichoke bisque, tomato-butternut and a take on eggplant Parmesan—it's her straightforward chicken vegetable that I can't resist. As good a cure-all as any cold-weather elixir, the incomparably concentrated (Druker calls it "triple-strength") broth follows her grandmother's simple formula: nothing but water, vegetables, thigh meat, backs and wings gurgling for hours in a well-worn kettle. In fact, for a full dose of "Jewish penicillin," don't forget to add a matzoh ball.

J-G AT THE W

Jean-Georges Vongerichten returns to Boston with a standout spot.

MARKET FRESH Crab fritters and slow-cooked salmon highlight the restaurant's approach to seafood.

USING THE MICHELIN Guide, the dining arbiter in chef Jean-Georges Vongerichten's native France, Market clearly merits a detour or even a journey. Vongerichten is known for his skills with seafood, yet Market's focus on vegetables, both as garnishes and side dishes, deserves special attention. His culinary vision, ably executed here by chef Chris Damskey, will make this restaurant a mecca for serious foodies. Best of all, a meal costs far less than at most eateries owned by three-star chefs, and you can dine at Market without taking out a mortgage.

Starters range in price from the single digits to $17 for the foie gras, a generous serving of rich duck liver presented on toasted brioche and garnished with a spiced fig jam. One bite, and I knew I was in for a treat. Crab fritters ($14) contained moist meat with a delightfully crisp exterior and a sweet-savory black-bean pepper-sauce. A small mountain of crispy clams ($11) arrived hot and impeccably fresh from the fryer with chili aioli for dipping. The seafood triumphs continued with seared scallops ($14), silky-textured mollusks with sweet and nutty overtones, and a clam pizza ($12), which I enjoyed at the bar. Accompanying the scallops, a delicious caramelized cauliflower provided the first sampling of Market's vegetable repertoire, whetting our interest and appetites. A salad of Boston lettuce and arugula ($9), dressed with a deftly herbed mustard vinaigrette, provided a light and refreshing palate cleanser.

Moving to mains, our waitress explained that the slow-cooked salmon ($23) had been roasted at 200 degrees. The result—moist and firm, almost flaky—set a high standard for a fish that's no stranger to our city. My wife ordered the baked lobster ($28) after learning that it was removed cooked from the shell, doused with butter and basil, and put back in before serving. Perfectly prepared, this local crustacean came with spaetzle and intensely flavorful butternut squash, potatoes and celery root.

Short ribs ($24) were glazed with soy, braised until perfectly tender, and accompanied by apple-jalapeño puree and rosemary breadcrumbs. Three thick lamb chops ($29) had an eye-catching presentation, with their bones rising from the plate and converging like tent stays. The impeccable meat more than matched the visual appeal. A duo of king oyster mushrooms and broccoli rabe nearly wrapped up the symphony of vegetables. (We ordered a side of roasted cauliflower with pistachios [$6] as a delectable coda.)

Desserts, a poached pear ($8) and passion-fruit ice cream ($6), would've been standouts had they followed any other meal. Here they were merely an anticipated continuation of the kitchen's virtuoso performance. The pear came in a pool of frangipane, the grainy texture of the former contrasting with the latter. The ice cream was at once tangy, tart and creamy.

Market's wines included a crisp, lively MoMo sauvignon blanc from New Zealand's Marlborough region ($13 for a small carafe) and a full-bodied Ben Marco malbec from Argentina ($34 a bottle), both well-structured exemplars of the craft of southern hemisphere producers.

All this and sophisticated surroundings. The restaurant's decor and design, including golden draperies stretching to the mile-high ceiling, provide a first-rate environment for its fine cuisine and professional, attentive service. Like the huge floral arrangement in the center of the dining room, Market stands out. It's a singular experience in a sea of competition. ×××

NEW WORLD HOARDER

The beauty of a bomber jacket and other stuff

I HAVE A HARD TIME PARTING with possessions. For instance, I own a Pat the Patriot jersey that I got in eighth grade and still wear for playoff games. But a vintage jersey is sort of cool. What's not cool is my collection of VHS tapes, my 1977 Scorpion Sting snowmobile and the celery root in my refrigerator, which might've started out as celery. Why do I have these things? Because I'm a hoarder.

You may have seen the A&E show Hoarders. It's fascinating and horrible all at the same time, like those TLC programs with names like Raised by Chickens and My Face Is on Backwards. Hoarders is pretty self-explanatory. It's about people who can't throw anything out. In some cases, you can't go inside a hoarder's house and swing a dead cat. There's no room, because of all the dead cats.

I'm sure some people watch the show with a sense of superiority. Because no matter how much life's got you down, you can always say, "You know, at least my dentures aren't lost in a pile of garbage in my living room." But Hoarders fills me with dread, because watching it makes me think about all the stupid crap I own and can't seem to throw away. I'm not saying I'd keep a cat skeleton, but I can kinda understand why someone would. And that's disturbing.

A quick inventory of possessions that I don't really need: chopsticks and soy-sauce packets. A bedroom dresser that I got on Craigslist for $35. Foam boat-cushions that I picked out of a neighbor's trash. A game of horseshoes that I bought before realizing that my patch of lawn isn't big enough to play horseshoes. Old cell phones.

Gifted bottles of liquor are the worst. As I've moved around the greater Boston area, I've dutifully packed a dusty bottle of tequila and enshrined it in each liquor cabinet along the way. On the label, under the words "certificado de botella," you can faintly see the numerals "99." So I've been toting this thing around for 11 years. I hate tequila, but what should I do with it? Maybe I could have a "clean out my liquor cabinet" party. Although, between the tequila and the Ezra Brooks whiskey, there might be a lot of fighting.

Since the Hoarders cleanup crew isn't coming to help me, I decide to pose a challenge to Heather. Each of us will start a possession purge by picking one item of the other's and getting rid of it. It's easier to part with things if you're not the one making the decision.

I can understand why someone would keep a cat skeleton. And that's disturbing.

Heather knows her pick without even thinking about it: the brown leather bomber jacket I got at a long-ago J.Crew sale at the Castle at Park Plaza. "I've never seen you wear it," she explains. "And it's stupid and ugly." Yeah, but I paid $80 for it, then another $80 to have it altered to fit. So that's like throwing away $160. Plus, what if brown leather bomber jackets come back into style? "That will never happen," Heather assures me.

OK, fine. Well, if the jacket goes, so does the wooden "Seaside Cottage" sign outside the front door. My view is that you can't have cutesy signs invoking the word "cottage" as long as you've got vinyl siding, and our house is a veritable fortress of vinyl siding. Also, if you really did have a seaside cottage, would you want to have a sign proclaiming it? Maybe it's my English-major background, but I believe in the credo of "show, don't tell." To me, that sign on our house is like putting a bumper sticker on a Chevy that reads "fancy car." There's nothing wrong with a Chevy, but what's up with the bumper sticker?

"You're not throwing that away," Heather informs me. "I'll take it down, but I'm going to save it until we have a place to put it on." OK, that sounds like a fine goal, but I'm still losing my bomber jacket, so something has to go. The issue is, Heather's much better at purging her possessions, so she doesn't have a lot of junk. Eventually, in a closet, I find her Discman. "Oh, go ahead and throw that thing away," she says.

I'm about to toss it in the garbage, enjoying this one small step back from the perpetual accumulation of belongings, when I pop it open and look inside. Whoa, close call: I almost threw away a perfectly good Monsters of Rap CD. But, of course, I didn't. In the words of MC Hammer, you can take my leather jacket, but U can't touch this. ✖✖✖

STATE OF PANIC

Financial lessons for anxious times

YOU CAN LEARN A LOT from periods of economic uncertainty marked by fear and even panic. I've seen actual panic four times in my years handling people's money. The first was after the assassination of President John F. Kennedy. I was a rookie stockbroker, just starting to give recommendations to prospective clients. I also assisted with sending buy-and-sell orders to New York on the teletype and changing the ink cartridges on the Trans-Lux machine, which transmitted the scrolling Big Board ticker tape electronically. Every day I'd leave my office with black ink stains all the way up my forearms and on my shirtsleeves.

I remember the ticker tape became unreadable at the same time the Dow Jones News printer tapped out that Kennedy had been shot. "Jesus, put the inkers in," shouted the brokers, looking to see the plunging prices. The phone on every desk exploded in rings. People flooded our office from all five floors of the building, huddling together. There were no TV talking heads yet; someone turned on a portable radio. The Dow Jones News Service had its own metal stand printing daily financial and political stories, and it whacked away with a steady clickety-clack, paper rolling onto the floor. A broker kept pulling off the recorded events, reading them aloud to everyone. "God help us all," a client said, crossing himself.

A call came through to me from another client, a cynical friend from my high-school days. "What can I sell short?" he asked. "Got to be able to make a score here." I felt sick to my stomach at the thought that anyone would want to profit off JFK's death and plunging prices. I hung up the phone and subsequently told him I wasn't interested in his business. "What are you, on some kind of high horse?" he said. "No," I answered. "But money shouldn't be your God. And I don't have to be a part of despicable behavior."

We all lose our innocence at different stages in our lives and over different things. Markets were shut down to limit the carnage, and I remember feeling that all would be lost, including my job. The resident manager in the office had worked on Wall Street during the Great Depression. He took me to the front windows overlooking Copley Square and said, "Look down at the activities on the streets. We have a constitution that provides, unlike almost any country in the world, for succession in times of fear and crisis. This will serve us well. See the cars in the streets and people going to libraries and churches and hotels. There is enormous energy in the country and great spirit as well. Today is horrific. But we'll survive this. And so will you." He was right. If you bought when markets reopened, you eventually prospered.

Many bad periods followed this event: despair, bumpy roads, even fearful times. But it wasn't until October 1987 that the next panic kicked in. I remember walking the halls of our office, seeing the meltdown and thinking, "My retirement is gone. Everything I've saved for destroyed." Stocks sold off and kept selling off through the day. The Dow Jones Industrials finished down 508 points, over 22 percent. It was the worst one-day decline in market history—the meltdown lopped $1 trillion off the market's value and traded 604 million shares, also a record.

Time Magazine asked if I'd come to New York to have dinner and talk about being in the eye of the storm, dealing with terrified clients. Manhattan seemed deserted to me, as if a neutron bomb had removed the people and left the buildings. Our restaurant, a high-end temple of food in the Peninsula Hotel, was almost empty. We had an after-dinner drink at the '21' Club, also empty at 10 pm. I flew home the next morning wondering, once again, "Would I have a job? Would all of my savings disappear?" And yet, in several months, markets recovered, and people seemed to have little memory of the pain of October.

These two panic moments offer several lessons, equally applicable to the emotional upheaval following 9/11 and to the current meltdown culminating in March 2009. The first is the amazing resilience of the American people. Notice I'm not talking about government or much of the media who comment on the immediate, passing scene—and almost never on implications for the future. I'm talking about people across the country reinventing themselves, rebranding, trying to figure out new ways to survive and thrive.

In a stock-market sense—and this is key to the second lesson—you should buy into a panic, snapping up your favorite domestic and global companies (unless you think it's all over for this country). Here's a tip: When markets are somewhat calm and optimistic (and this will happen), pick the five stocks or Exchange Traded Funds you wish you could own for the future. Be disciplined and assemble your list. Put orders for these stocks in at prices 25 percent lower than they're currently selling at. And leave them in "good until cancelled" at these lower prices.

Perhaps you want to buy Intel, expecting its stock to grow with spreading global demand. But you don't want to pay the current price, say $20. Put an order in at $15, 25 percent below $20. And leave the order in at $15. In a fearful market, when almost everyone else runs for the sidelines, you could buy at a distressed price. Go against the crowd. If you're disciplined this way, a panic can be your friend. ×××

5 RANDOM NUMBERS

37: That's the age of Mike Cameron, who's about to become the oldest Opening Day centerfielder in Red Sox history. And here's my question: What happens when the old man needs a break, or strains a hammy, or goes on the DL? Does Ellsbury just switch back? On the one hand, you need Ells getting as many reps as he can in left; he needs to learn how to play balls off the Monster. But conversely, do you really want Bill Hall playing center when there's a far more capable guy standing right next to him?

18: That's the number of double-doubles Rajon Rondo has over the Celtics' first 36 games—after posting only 15 in 2009! If you're looking for a reason to feel better about KG's breakdown, here it is: The season no longer lives and dies with Garnett's knee. It's Rondo's team now, and they'll go as far as his ever-expanding dominance takes them.

15: That's the number of times—through 45 games—that the Bruins have been held to one or fewer goals in a game. Startling, when you consider that only happened 13 times all of last year! With Savard on the shelf for at least another few weeks, it's on the goalies to bring the B's back. So if you happen to run into Tim Thomas—and have a lighter handy—don't hesitate to spark a flame under his ass.

7: The Patriots just completed their seventh consecutive 10-win season, making them only the fourth franchise in NFL history to achieve the feat. The others? The 49ers (1983-98), the Cowboys (1975-81) and the Colts (2002-present). Little known fact: Bill Polian considers the Colts' streak to be the greatest accomplishment in team history.

0: That's the number of times the Celtics have had their top eight players in uniform at the same time this season. Best-case scenario, this streak ends right before the All-Star break when Marquis Daniels returns from thumb surgery. Worst case? That fact becomes the rallying cry of Celtics Nation as we sit home in May, watching yet another Cleveland/Orlando showdown.

1 ONE SURPRISINGLY SERIOUS QUESTION

Which team is more likely to win a Super Bowl next: Belichick's Pats or Pioli's Chiefs? Or how about this: If the two were playing in Week 1 of next season, who would you pick? Sadly, both questions are harder to answer than you'd think.

2 GAME SHOW IDEAS

Offseason Pyramid
Host: OK, Mr. Papelbon, it comes down to this. For $1M, name one player your team acquired this offseason. Ready... go! Paps: Oooh... OK... um, err... uhhh, wait a second, what team do I play for again? (Buzzer) Host: Oh, I'm sorry, you're out of time. Paps: Huh? Where am I?

Make That Sub
Host: Welcome back, everybody! We're here with Celtics associate head coach Tom Thibodeau, and we're giving him 19 minutes to make one substitution! The clock starts... now!... Um, Mr. Thibodeau? Mr. Thibodeau?! What's going on, sir? Why aren't you doing anything?!

3 Patriots Priorities

Be Offensive I'm not sure how to handle this one. Maybe we drop a little acid into the coaches' coffee? Or how about forcing a bong hit on Bill O'Brien before every practice? Either way, something needs to be done about the Pats' offensive game plan. If I see one more draw out of the shotgun formation, I'll be drawing a shotgun of my own.

Return Games As much as you probably hate Ellis Hobbs, you have to admit the man sure knew how to return a kickoff. That's something that can't be said for any of the guys who filled his shoes in 2009. So, how about making a run at Cleveland's Josh Cribbs? He'll want big bucks, but the guy's a game-changer and has the kind of versatility that makes Belichick all hot and bothered.

On Draft Day Draft players! No more stockpiling picks. No more posturing. No more trading out. Just. Pick. Players. Thanks.

4 DATES TO WATCH

1/24: It's time for the AFC Championship, which means it's time for another fake LT injury! So, what will it be this year? MCL sprain? Sore groin? UTI?

1/29: The Celtics get one last chance to take down the Hawks. Thankfully, I've already got Bennett Salvatore cuffed to a pipe in my basement

1/31: The Lakers invade the Garden the only time this season, so get all those Khloe Kardashian, "Vujabitch" and "Gasol looks like a Fraggle" jokes out now. And be sure to make them count.

2/2: Ned? Ned Ryerson? It's Groundhog Day at the Garden as the Bruins host all-world center Alex Ovechkin and the Washington Capitals.

Soroff On JONATHAN ADLER

The famous designer talks about "happy chic," constipated artists and why mauve is suicidal.

DESIGN GURU JONATHAN ADLER was born and raised in New Jersey. Adler, 43, started sculpting pottery at an early age, and by 1994 he had an order to sell his wares at Barneys New York. Four years later, he opened his first store in New York before going bicoastal with a boutique in L.A. In 2002, he launched a furniture collection and soon expanded into bedding, towels, stationery and interior-design projects at places like the Parker Palm Springs Hotel. By 2005, Adler had stores in Miami, Chicago, San Francisco and on Madison Avenue, and he had written his first book on design. He's the head judge on Bravo's Top Design and is married to his longtime partner, Simon Doonan, the creative director of Barneys. They live primarily in New York with their beloved terrier, Liberace. Adler recently opened a boutique on Newbury Street.

Jonathan Soroff: What was the last thing you made by hand?
Jonathan Adler: I made a mug this morning. I still spend a lot of time at the potter's wheel.

Ever get visited by Patrick Swayze's ghost?
No, but I get visited by people who bring that up every minute of every day of my entire life. It's the potter's curse.

Any child labor involved in the Adler empire?
Actually, no. I get a lot of my stuff produced in Peru by an organization called Aid to Artisans, which is a nonprofit that connects artists with artisans for a kind of non–Kathie Lee Gifford business relationship. When I have stuff made in Asia, it's all at vetted workshops.

Do you think that in 50 years, your signature pieces will be collectors' items like the Eames chair?
That's certainly my goal and dream. Basically, our motto is: "We won't make it if your heirs won't fight over it." I hope my legacy is a lot of lawsuits between siblings.

How would you describe your aesthetic?
I call it "happy chic." It's about making design that's, I hope, unimpeachably gorgeous but with an element of levity and totally not snobbish.

If I walk into a guy's house and everything is Jonathan Adler, is it safe to assume he's gay?
I think it's safe to assume that he's groovy. A lot of straights are collecting my shit.

Lesbians, even?
Oh, yeah. I think they get an unfair reputation for being un-groovy.

Elle Decor or Architectural Digest?
One hundred billion, zillion, squintillion percent Elle Decor. No contest.

Favorite fashion designer right now?
I'm going to go menswear here and say Sir Paul Smith. I love everything he does. The perfect example of the creative funster who does it all on his own terms and is wildly successful and idiosyncratic. I love him.

Favorite fashion designer of all time?
I think Bonnie Cashin. She's the perfect example of happy chic. Her stuff was colorful and bold and fun, but she really appreciated craft. As for a current women's fashion designer, I'd have to go with Isabel Toledo. Again, an idiosyncratic talent.

Do you see yourself as a design revolutionary?
I'm proud to have been involved in making pottery groovy and needlepoint groovy, and I'm always flattered to see my influence in all the knockoffs.

So the rip-offs don't bother you?
First of all, it's the reality of the world we live in, and unless it's a huge company doing it in an aggressive kind of way, it's flattering and a reminder that one needs to constantly be coming up with new stuff and looking forward.

Whose taste, living or dead, do you most admire?
I gotta give it up to David Hicks. He was so fun and colorful and dramatic and bold. I love him.

Are you a hoarder?
No. I'm the anti-hoarder. I have a lot of stuff, but I get rid of a lot because I'm always making something.

Is there one thing you'd never throw away?
One hundred percent my husband. Other than that, probably this painting I have of Sly Stone that was from the Playboy mansion. I love it.

What's your take on the use of the term decorator vs. designer?
Anyone who has a problem or feels belittled by being called a decorator instead of designer is insane. You can call me a potter, a decorator, a monkey, and I could not care less because I know who I am and what I do.

What's the dividing line between what you do and being a fine artist?
I think that with artists, they have to be creatively constipated in order to be taken seriously, so I'm thrilled not to call myself an artist. If they're prolific, they're not taken seriously.

What one color can you not live without?
That's an impossible question for me, but probably orange.

Is there a color you absolutely can't stand?
Mauve.

Purple's my favorite color!
Mauve is in the purple family, but it's as if purple was suicidal. When you say mauve, I want to jump out the window.

Would you describe your aesthetic as retro?
I don't love that term, but there's no question that in a lot of my work I'm inspired by midcentury design.

Most unconventional use to which you've ever put a basket chair?
[Laughs.] None that I can talk about.

So where does kitsch lie?
I hate kitsch. People often assume I like it, but by definition it's something that appeals to someone with undiscriminating taste. I make things that are idiosyncratic and playful, but I hope it also has a really strong sense of craft and beauty, which is the opposite of kitsch.

Will you come over to my house and do a Jonathan Adler extreme home makeover?
I'll come to anyone's house and do an extreme home makeover if they have an extremely large bank account. ✖✖✖ basic necessity

WINE GOES MAINSTREAM.

BY MASTER OF WINE SANDY BLOCK & PHOTOGRAPHS BY ANTHONY TIEULI

It may have taken a recession to drive home the point, but 2009 showed that wine-drinking ranks right up there with Internet access as essential to our daily lives. Despite the economic mess, wine bottles (and boxes!) keep landing in our shopping baskets with significantly greater frequency. There's no precedent in this country for disposable-income decreasing and consumption increasing. Our behavior looks more European, around the fringes at least, eliminating the old elitism. As literary oenophile and ex-pat Ernest Hemingway reflected in A Moveable Feast, "In Europe we thought of wine as something as healthy and normal as food.... Drinking wine was not a snobbism nor a sign of sophistication nor a cult; it was as natural as eating and to me as necessary." There's less fuss and bother surrounding wine today, and a local industry has developed to cater to this new mood. In fact, Boston stands at the forefront of this lifestyle transformation, and the wine scene here mirrors what's happening in the culture at large.

"In Europe we thought of wine as something as healthy and normal as food.... Drinking wine was not a snobbism nor a sign of sophistication nor a cult; it was as natural as eating and to me as necessary."
—Ernest Hemingway

Analyzing overall sales, listening to local mavens and feeling the market's pulse, some unmistakable trends emerge. First and foremost: value! People want to spend less and seem wary of overpaying. The recession helped encourage this shift as previously unobtainable wines began selling at reduced prices about a year ago. But it's not just wine for wine's sake, or prestige labels at a bargain that consumers want—we want flavor! Image and familiarity still influence our buying habits, but they no longer dominate. That's due to our new spirit of adventure. Bostonians are picking wine from previously unknown grape varieties (albariño, grüner veltliner, garnacha) and exotic regions (Valdeorras, Campania, Waipara) that used to languish in a corner of a wine list or retail store. As recently as a few years ago, labels had to sport a Napa, Sonoma, Bordeaux, Burgundy or Tuscany pedigree to attract interest.

A cadre of passionate businesspeople in the restaurant and retail worlds is leading the change. Youthful and energetic, they're not only transforming our collective palate, they're moving the industry forward. Today's tastemakers are buying what they like rather than dutifully following numerical scores from periodicals whose pronouncements still dictate much of the trade. It's not so much, "Try this. It got 90 points from Parker." Instead, selling wine has become intensely personal, based on a relationship that's better summarized as, "Here's something I like. Why don't you give it a shot?" Or better yet: "What are you having for dinner tonight? What styles do you like?" These merchants stand behind every bottle they stock because they've tasted them personally. They market by word of mouth. They deliver the message ("value, flavor, adventure"), in some cases using social media. They're creating community one customer at a time, and their enthusiasm is palpable. →

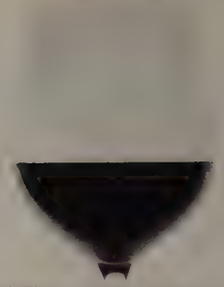
ONE INSIDER'S TASTE

An exemplar of this open-minded attitude is Dale Cruse, a Dedham-based blogger who chronicles his tasting adventures. "I once read a review that likened a white wine to 'the sound of a flute in a still meadow.' What the f does that even mean?!" he writes online. Cruse keeps it real at Esprit du Vin in Milton, Bin Ends in Braintree and the Wine Bottega in the North End. What do they have in common? Proprietors—Keith F. Mills, John Hafferty and Kern Platt, respectively—not born into the business, but who took the time to educate themselves. They're finding fresh, unique wines that fit the current mood, as well as their customers' preferences. These stores are too small to carry everything, so their owners choose selectively, highlighting often-obscure labels. This 'less is more' philosophy fits right into contemporary buying habits. In the restaurant world, Cruse offers another eclectic mix. "My favorite places for wine are Troquet, the Beehive, Neptune Oyster, Legal Sea Foods and Les Zygomates. Why this list? 'Great wine by the glass and super pricing. You can always find something interesting to drink that won't set you back too much.' (Full disclosure: Dale is Troquet's Web designer and I preside over the beverage program at Legal.)



CABERNET SAUVIGNON: Cab is king of the jungle, and as we keep absorbing ever-greater oceans of red wine, it'll continue to grow in the market. Chile is one of the few countries expanding sales in the U.S. over the past few years, and it's still one of the best places to find cabernet value.

CHARDONNAY: Still most popular, but the prom queen's beginning to lose some of her luster. This is the comfort-zone wine, and while you continue to hear it called at bars—"I'll have a chard"—such requests are no longer attracting quite the same admiring glances. It seems there's a backlash to oak and few of our buyers mustered much excitement about the grape. Still, Patrick Dubsky, proprietor at Winestone in Chestnut Hill, reports that among his clientele "chardonnay is still strong, particularly if it's not overdone." Oak-free anyone?

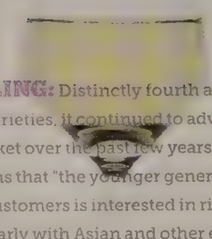
MALBEC: Tailor-made for the recession and selling everywhere, it's the new go-to wine. "Malbec is very hot," John Hafferty of Bin Ends says simply. Don't expect a downturn in its fortunes anytime soon.

MERLOT: Very strong in the market overall, but does it have fashionability, adventure, value? Not so much. Having said that, you can still find great merlot from Chile at a good price. But, to paraphrase a friend, "If they ask me what my favorite merlot is, I'm going to answer carmenère every time."

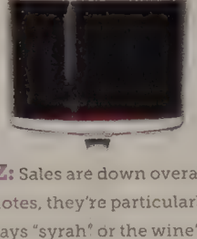
THE GLASS IS FULL

Cab is king of the jungle, and it'll continue to grow in the market.

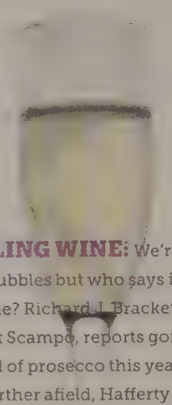
PINOT NOIR: Chris Campbell, proprietor of Troquet, says his customers are still infatuated with this grape and are enjoying whatever he stocks, although his Burgundy clientele is very vintage specific ("looking for the classics: 2005, 1999, 1993"). Keith P. Mills from Esprit du Vin reports finding great value in the under-$15 range from southern France and that "people don't care as much where it comes from as how it tastes." Ditto almost everyone else I spoke to. Pinot noir is a winner.



ROSÉ: Boston's finally awakened! Jonas Atwood, sommelier at Meritage for the past five years, serves what he describes as world-class rosé, including wines from southern France and northern Italy. It's seasonal, but you'll no longer be embarrassed to pick up a glass of something pink.



PINOT GRIGIO: It's still a force, second only among whites to chardonnay, but not a single one of our wine buyers had a good thing to say about it. What does that tell you? If this grape were a stock, I'd short it.



SAUVIGNON BLANC: Growing in popularity, it holds a solid third place among white varieties but is the only one of those three that's gaining ground. Hafferty says New Zealand remains tops, but he's also finding good options from southern France and the Loire.

RIESLING: Distinctly fourth among the white varieties, it continued to advance in the market over the past few years. Dubsky mentions that "the younger generation of my customers is interested in riesling, particularly with Asian and other ethnic cuisines." Amen! Here's a trend that has legs, especially now that we've learned not all rieslings are sweet and that, furthermore, sweet is not bad, if it's balanced with acid.

SHIRAZ: Sales are down overall, but, Hafferty notes, they're particularly bad if the label says "syrah" or the wine's over $25. Cheap, "tooty-fruity," candied shiraz from Australia is sinking like a stone. Is there a bottom? The one bright spot: South Africa.

SPARKLING WINE: We're still drinking bubbles but who says it has to be Champagne? Richard J. Brackett, general manager at Scampo, reports going through a great deal of prosecco this year, while, ranging further afield, Hafferty has been featuring blanquette de Limoux and moderately priced Spanish cava. Dubsky has also had success with crémant de Bourgogne. The common element: value.

BLENDS: Blends are no longer viewed as inferior, and there's a greater openness to them, says Raphael Keller-Go, founder of Vinodivino in Newton. It's an oft-repeated sentiment. Mills reports that he's had success with Bordeaux under $15.

IN A HAPPY PLACE BOUTIQUE EXPERIENCE

With locations in the South End and the Financial District Brix Wine Shop displays its booze in stylish spaces—unlike the warehouse feel of most liquor stores. They provide places to linger and learn from a welcoming staff.

FRUIT OF YOUR LOIN

THE MATCHMAKER

Meritage chef Daniel Bruce takes the guesswork out of ordering by listing wines according to the food they complement. Venison loin wrapped in prosciutto goes nicely with La Jota Howell Mountain cabernet sauvignon. Bruce shares his expertise at the Boston Wine Festival, running through April 7 at the Boston Harbor Hotel.

A spirit of adventure has taken hold as our drinking map expands.

NOTHING AGAINST NAPA Entering New Territory

Argentina: The fastest-growing import category for the second year in a row, up more than 30 percent again this year. People can't get enough of Argentina, and although it's mostly malbec, there's interest in torrontes (at Winestone) and bonarda (at Bin Ends) as well. Look for Argentina to keep tangoing its way into our hearts. At least through 2010.

Australia: "A bloodbath," Hafferty says, noting "severe cuts in price" from the country that, until a few years ago, was the ultimate success story in the American market.

California: Uh-uh! Keller-Go echoes a common sentiment, noting strong migration away from the Golden State's wine this year. Why? "Southern Italy, southern France, Chile, Argentina, Spain: These are the wines we're finding at our customers' sweet spot of $15–$18 that more than compete with wines twice the price from California." Mills agrees: "Better value in Europe than in the U.S., especially around the $12-price point." He's had success switching California cab drinkers to Spain and Argentina. On the other hand, Hafferty says he's found some moderately priced California, red-wine blends, many based on zinfandel, that provide rich fruit and immediate drinkability.

Italy: Still the reigning import champ, Italy's been on a volume slide the past few years. There are pockets of real excitement, however, especially with wines from the south and in the whites category. Brackett reports he's serving a significant amount of falanghina from Campania with Scampo's Italian cuisine.

PAIR CICCHETTI WITH WINES FROM ITALY AT CENTRAL BOTTLE.

Portugal: Although overall numbers don't bear it out, there's a swell of enthusiasm for Portuguese reds, especially from Atwood, who successfully marketed a Douro Valley blend, and Hafferty, who describes himself as "dabbling" in what's surely one of the most challenging of the hand-sell, import niches. If recent tastings are any indication, this could be a growth category for 2010.

Rhône Valley: We're talking about reds here, and Campbell reports gobbling up modestly priced Côtes du Rhônes from the 2007 vintage, which are classically structured and full of fruit, yet very accessible when young, making them ideal for his clientele. The same has happened at Winestone, according to Dubsky. Once the '07s are gone? Anyone's guess.

Spain: Although it stopped growing in 2009 overall, there's a lot of enthusiasm for what Iberia, and Spain in particular, brings to the table. According to Campbell: "Spanish reds are flying; they're the new Australia. People looking for that upfront, fruit flavor are settling there now." ✖✖✖

The Celtics' practice gym echoes with familiar noise. First comes the rhythmic bounce of a basketball, boom bip like a drummer hitting a high hat. Rajon Rondo feels as relaxed with that sound as with the ones that follow: the laughter, rustle and shrieks of temporary drama ("Oh my God!") from a group of awestruck teenagers, excited to hang out with the pros on a winter afternoon.

It doesn't take long for the teens to break the ice. One minute they're asking Paul Pierce when he enjoyed his first kiss (answer: ninth grade). Then they're shooting layups with Tony Allen. Next they're snapping pictures and playing Connect Four with Ryan Hollins.

ON camera for roughly 40 minutes a night, he's the Celtics' fastest, flashiest, youngest and most unpredictable starter. He's their 23-year-old conductor who has the fewest years in the game yet is most responsible for deciding where the ball goes next.

When the cameras turn off, Rondo is an assist man without the flash. He has a knack for landing in tough places where young people can use help, which explains his connection to the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. According to the organization, Massachusetts has one of the highest rates of confirmed cases of child abuse and neglect in the country.

Rondo, routinely and quietly, does his part. He has taken kids roller skating. He has taken them shopping for new clothes. He has arrived at the MSPCC offices looking for an assignment. The standard NBA contract requires players to participate in a couple of team functions, but as one of Rondo's bosses says, "He goes above and beyond what's required. There's no pressure coming from the organization. He certainly isn't doing this for the recognition."

That boss, Celtics co-owner Steve Pagliuca, would know. He's one of the few people who has seen Rondo's two worlds up close. Pagliuca has been the MSPCC's chairman for the past six years. He's also witnessed Rondo's entire career from a distance where you don't have to shout to get a player's attention.

For different reasons, Rondo is underrated in both fields. He says he likes it that way, especially when it comes to his work with kids. "It's from the heart," he says. "I'm not looking for the acknowledgement of, 'Hey, he's a good guy.' I know I'm a good guy. I don't do things to get a standing ovation or an award at the end of the day. I do it because I want to do it. I don't want a big crowd or a big show. I don't need a banquet."

He's sometimes misunderstood and undervalued on the basketball court for a couple reasons: It's hard to find someone his size, 6' 1" with seemingly one-percent body fat, who plays the way he does; and in the era of advanced scouting and hyperanalysis, he figures out ways to produce when the reports say that he shouldn't. While other elite point guards, Deron Williams and Chris Paul among them, are better perimeter shooters, Rondo is able to control games in ways that they couldn't imagine—or wouldn't be comfortable—doing.

For example, he began the season with a three-game stretch in which he accumulated 37 assists but averaged just barely over five field-goal attempts per game. Williams, whom Rondo considers the best point guard in the game right now, has just one game all season in which he's attempted fewer than 10 shots. Coaches and commentators have yammered for years about little guys having to be able to extend the floor (or shoot jumpers) for a team to be successful. Otherwise, a defense could sag and make life difficult for other players.

Rondo, apparently, is an outlier. "Of all the players on the team," former Celtic Satch Sanders says, "he's the one they can't live without." Sanders, 71, won eight championships as a Celtic. He played with and against some of the biggest stars in the league's history. But Sanders pauses when asked if he's ever seen a player who reminds him of Rondo.

"Maybe Tiny Archibald?" he says after a while. "I think that's the closest one, because in Rondo I see an ability to get wherever he needs to go on the court. And that's how Tiny was."

It's fitting that the New Tiny, so to speak, is invested in working with young people. In two years, he could be the face of the team while having the face of the kids who look up to him. Any bartender who doesn't do a double take when looking at him and the 1986 on his driver's license isn't paying attention.

His music, from Keri Hilson to Alicia Keys to Drake, is the music on the teenagers' iPods. He's got a wide-ranging eye when it comes to fashion. On some days, you'll find him in the slim European suits of the boardroom, and other days, like when the kids are storming the practice court, he's in campuswear: True Religion jeans with red stitching on the back pocket—which picks up the streak of red in his sneakers.

He even has a gift that most high school and college students would fight for. "Usually, when I'm learning something and see it once, I've got it," says Rondo, who grew up in Louisville and entered the NBA after two years at the University of Kentucky. "I'm a visual learner, and I learn really easily. I didn't get straight A's in school, but test time wasn't difficult for me. I could cram. I could easily look at something the night before, keep it in my memory and ace the test. I used to do that all the time in math class. English? I didn't like to write papers, revise, rough drafts, all that stuff. Math? Cake walk.

"You could say I have a photographic memory. But sometimes it gets me in trouble during the season. Sometimes Doc [Rivers] will draw up a play, and I'll just get it. So while other guys are talking about it, I'm thinking of four or five plays I'm gonna call after that. But I do a pretty good job of retaining what's discussed in the huddle."

When Rondo's name was mentioned in trade rumors last June, one of the reasons given was the team's uncertainty about whether they could re-sign him (he has since signed a five-year extension, which begins next season, worth $55 million). Another reason was supposedly an intractable streak, a streak that prevented him from accepting coaching.

"I need to be a better listener," Rondo admits. "But when you go to 'uncoachable,' I think it's a big slap in the face. I'm very coachable. When I feel a certain way, I'm gonna speak my opinion, but I'm always thinking of what's best for the team. It's never a selfish thing out there. I'm a strong-willed guy. Me and Doc may disagree, and I may go to the bench frustrated. But he can coach me. I don't think he's ever said he couldn't."

Bob Cousy used to say that great point guards were born. He argued that you could go to a local playground and see from afar which kids were the point guards. True point guards aren't society's waffflers. Nor do they lack opinions, vision or imagination. They're usually picky artists who don't want you peering over a shoulder as they work a canvas, even if you've done what they're doing (Cousy and Oscar Robertson, two of the greatest ever, clashed when the former coached the latter in Cincinnati). They can be stubborn until you actually show them something else that will work better.

It's a story that's been going on in the NBA for a half century. That was the case in 1960, when the freestyling—for the time—Cousy set the franchise record for assists. It's the same 50 years later with Rondo on pace to break Cousy's record. The great point guards see the road ahead, long before you do. That's why Rondo is confident and self-aware enough to direct veterans like Pierce, Ray Allen and Kevin Garnett, analyze his own game ("I've got to play better defense; I'm putting other guys in foul trouble with my defense."), take on the kids in board and video games, and see the future.

Asked if he knows what he'll be doing 10 years from now, Rondo smiles. "I do, but I don't know if I can comment on it right now. I don't want to make a big deal about it, but it might be interesting. It depends on how I'm doing in the NBA, how many rings I've got. Hopefully, I'll have at least a couple more rings."

A few guesses are thrown out. Rondo bats them all away. "Nah," he says. "I'll keep you posted. If things go as planned, I'll be here at least five more years." ✖✖✖

"HOPEFULLY, I'll have at least a couple more rings."

I always have bed head.
I think my mother started thrifting when she was pregnant with me. She and my sister had their thrifting alter egos: Myrtle and Zelda. They called me "Groovy" 'til I was 11.
I don't think I've owned an iron since I stopped waiting tables. I used to get in trouble for it. I think I was even sent home once.
Wardrobe essential? I've always had a thing for cardigans.
I've had this purple shirt since I was 17 and now I'm 42.

Where do you shop?
40 South Street in Jamaica Plain and Artifaktori in Davis Square. Mostly, I just take from the shop and recycle.

Oldest piece in your wardrobe?
My one-piece vintage Shriner's bowler mechanic's worksuit.

When I first started this store, I had no idea what the f I was doing. I still don't really...

The theme of the shop is simply "stuff I like," which carries over to what I wear.

When you travel with a vintage suitcase, you never have to worry about which bag is yours. And [illegible] suitcase make for a surprisingly [illegible]

A Wine Expo-sé

BLANC SLATE

LET YOUR SPIRITS soar at this year's Boston Wine Expo at the Seaport World Trade Center, buoyed by the promise of "global adventure in a glass." The event features more than 1,800 bottles, while chefs like Aura's Rachel Klein and La Morra's Josh Ziskin hit the stage for cooking demonstrations. Among the many seminars is a crash course with keynote speaker and wine author Kevin Zraly, who takes guests on a whirlwind tasting. Expertise not required.

Double Vision

Life Imitating Art

[Title of Show] is the title of a show about two guys writing a musical about two guys writing a musical. Got that? Hunter and Jeff—the actual names of the creators, just to make things extra meta—long to fulfill their dreams of becoming Tony Award–winners. With the help of some friends, the pair work through writer's block and creative squabbles to get their show onstage, while onstage. See this comedy-within-a-comedy at the Calderwood Pavilion through Feb. 13. Hayley Miller

Avatar ★ ½ Twelve years and some $400 million later, James Cameron's latest opus lands with a thud. Sure, you can admire the 3-D presentation, performance-capture technique and computer animation. (If you're not already impressed enough, characters keep elbowing you in the ribs, a reminder that you're watching something amazing.) This is groundbreaking, next-level technology, and I was bored out of my damn mind. Looking like a tacky airbrush painting, Avatar is CGI eye candy by way of prog-rock album covers with an absence of characterization and an abundance of corny dialogue. Unabashedly ripping off Terrence Malick's The New World, Kevin Costner's Dances With Wolves and his own Aliens, Cameron sends Sam Worthington's crippled space marine to a distant planet to reenact a banal white-guy-saves-the-natives fantasy. It feels recycled, rehashed and more like an F/X demo reel than an actual movie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Blind Side ★ The inspirational true story of the Baltimore Ravens' Michael Oher becomes one of the year's most inadvertently offensive movies, thanks to Sandra Bullock's rampaging ego and the kind of unconscious racism Hollywood does better than anyone else. Oher, the troubled son of a crack addict, spent much of his childhood homeless before being adopted by a rich, white family who kindly helped him fulfill his potential. But instead of focusing on Oher's moving struggle, The Blind Side spends two hours inviting us to worship the selflessness of his new mom, played by Bullock as an amalgamation of Julia Roberts' least appealing qualities. She fires off sassy one-liners in endless glamour shots, while the rest of the cast nods approvingly and tells us how great she is. Oher, played by Quinton Aaron, is given no thoughts of his own. He just thanks her profusely and does what he's told. This isn't a movie about adopting a son; it's about adopting a pet. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Crazy Heart ★★ ½ In his best performance since The Big Lebowski, Jeff Bridges stars as a washed-up, alcoholic country singer touring lousy Southwestern dive bars. Scott Cooper's debut feature initially boasts a grungy authenticity, but just when you think Crazy Heart is on its way to being The Wrestler of country music, a banal redemption formula kicks in and sends the whole film reeling off into inspirational TV-movie land. The too-young Maggie Gyllenhaal proves an improbable love interest for Bridges' seedy troubadour, and (an excellent) Colin Farrell drops by as a former protégé who makes success look far too easy. The grim, admirable desolation of the film's early passages is quickly abandoned for garden-variety uplift and clichéd rehab scenes. The late-game addition of Robert Duvall as a curmudgeonly AA aficionado only adds to the phoniness. These brave performances deserved better. (At Boston Common and Kendall Square.)

An Education ★★ ½ In what's sure to be Roman Polanski's favorite film of the year, dazzling newcomer Carey Mulligan stars as a 16-year-old schoolgirl who falls under the sway of Peter Sarsgaard's suave 30-something hepcat in gloomy, postwar Britain. Adapted by novelist Nick Hornby from Lynn Barber's memoir, the movie takes a tender look back at statutory rape as a rite of passage, and it's a testament to some fine performances that the film only feels icky in retrospect. There's nobody better than Hornby at dissecting all the ways people like to define themselves through their tastes and fascinations, but in nearly every other respect, his screenplay is too fussy and neat for its own good. This is a very polite, middlebrow view of what must've actually been an extremely messy affair. Director Lone Scherfig keeps everything humming pleasantly along, with even the inevitable betrayals and recriminations occurring at a genteel pitch. It's as if all the characters are afraid to raise their voices. The feel-good final reel is almost unforgivable. (At Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Fantastic Mr. Fox ★★★ ½ Writer/director Wes Anderson's fastidious, sometimes suffocating, attention to costume detail and production design make his movies feel like they're taking place in dollhouses, so it makes sense that he would work with puppets. Rendered in hand-crafted, stop-motion animation, this marvelous adaptation of the Roald Dahl story may look like one of those Rankin-Bass holiday specials from the 1970s, but it still feels like a Wes Anderson film. It's got the filmmaker's dysfunctional family pathos and droll hipster humor, only with woodland animals instead of actors. George Clooney voices the title

Peter Jackson makes a Technicolor mess of the afterlife.

The Lovely Bones ★
Starring Saoirse Ronan, Mark Wahlberg, Rachel Weisz and Stanley Tucci. Based on the novel by Alice Sebold. Written by Peter Jackson, Fran Walsh and Philippa Boyens. Directed by Peter Jackson. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

OH MY, WHAT HAPPENED? Peter Jackson, New Zealand's splatter-movie hero turned tedious golden boy, took Alice Sebold's beloved novel and conceived the kind of film that only somebody convinced of their own genius could create.

The Lovely Bones isn't just a lousy picture; it's bad on a legendary scale. Already a punch line among folks in the industry, the movie's planned December expansion was scuttled after early screenings ended in peals of derisive laughter. Yes, I was there, and indeed found myself cackling at the top of my lungs. So if you'd like to thank me for this lump of coal not ending up in your Christmas stocking, I'll gladly take full responsibility.

Sebold's novel tells the tragic tale of Susie Salmon, a precocious youngster who falls victim to a neighborhood pedophile (Stanley Tucci, oozing evil from his fake mustache) and never escapes his bizarre underground playroom. How such a fidgety weirdo could construct an elaborate death trap beneath an abandoned cornfield without attracting attention is never explained. Nor do we have an idea why any child would go anywhere near this squirmy creep.

Alas, Saorise Ronan's monotone Susie soon finds herself stuck in "the in-between," which is a lot like heaven, except with crappier CGI. Surrounded by giant computer-generated ships-in-bottles and fantasy visions of a dream-date with her goofy boyfriend, young Susie's sorry afterlife outdoes the notorious Robin Williams weepathon What Dreams May Come for most-tacky netherworld. She's even got a plucky sidekick—also murdered by Tucci—on hand to offer words of wisdom.

The horrifically miscast Mark Wahlberg (stepping in for Ryan Gosling, who walked off the project after a sudden attack of common sense) plays Susie's father, who grieves maniacally, smashes props and tries to solve his daughter's murder. The town's head homicide detective (Michael Imperioli) is too distracted by an affair he's having with Wahlberg's wife (Rachel Weisz) to do much investigative work. Sadly, nobody ever thought to question Tucci's dollhouse-building weirdo across the street for more than a couple of minutes.

> Jackson's an infant sitting at the grown-up table right now, thanks to the Oscar committee.

Did I mention there's also a teenage psychic who broods like Ally Sheedy in The Breakfast Club? I don't know how she fits in either.

Jackson's fiasco never figures out what story it's trying to tell. His is the tragic saga of a director so fascinated by his computer-generated bells and whistles that he's forgotten the nuts and bolts of filmmaking. Every shot is a trick-shot, as Jackson's camera swoops in circles or upside down, dwelling on blindingly enhanced colors and phony vistas.

Just when you think things can't get any more embarrassing, Susan Sarandon turns up as Susie's drunken, slutty grandmother. Glammed out and chain-smoking, she owns a spectacularly awful slapstick montage in which she attempts to perform household tasks and fails miserably. Yes, we must grieve for a child who was raped and murdered, but only after we giggle at a trashed Sarandon trying to work a washing machine.

Let's get down to brass tacks here and admit that Jackson—a filmmaker who was previously lauded for zombie flicks and adolescent pleasures—somehow dragged The Lord of the Rings saga and his remake of King Kong to interminable, dulling lengths. He's an infant sitting at the grown-up table right now, thanks to the Oscar committee. The Lovely Bones proves once and for all that he has no business making movies for adults.

The film's final collision of plot contrivances, in which the plucky baby sister solves the murder at the exact moment Weisz moves back home to make up with Wahlberg, is so unremittingly hilarious, it brought to mind the satirical sequence in Werner Herzog's Bad Lieutenant: Port of Call New Orleans, when every loose end is miraculously wrapped up while Nicolas Cage muses, "So I guess everything worked out OK, then?" And all that's before the "icicle ex machina."

The Lovely Bones is many things; OK isn't one of them. ✖✖✖

character, a reformed chicken-thief turned newspaper columnist itching to return to his criminal roots. His antics stoke the ire of three nasty farmers, and Mr. Fox and family find themselves on the run. Boasting bone-dry vocal turns from Meryl Streep, Jason Schwartzman and Bill Murray, the movie feels like a summation of Anderson's career thus far, with certain scenes lifted almost directly from The Royal Tenenbaums and The Life Aquatic With Steve Zissou. (At Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

The Imaginarium of Dr. Parnassus ★★ Terry Gilliam can't catch a break. The 2002 documentary Lost in La Mancha chronicles The Man Who Killed Don Quixote, Gilliam's aborted project that fell victim to natural disasters, catastrophic health problems and general bad planning. Just when things were starting to look up, Gilliam took on The Imaginarium of Dr. Parnassus. First, star Heath Ledger passed away, then producer William Vince succumbed to cancer. During post-production, the director was hit by a car and broke his back. I wish I could report a triumph over impossible odds, but this film is an unholy mess. Christopher Plummer stars as an immortal, old-time street performer lugging a stage set across modern-day London, while gambling with the devil (Tom Waits) over how many souls he can save. Ledger turns up as a con man, with Johnny Depp, Colin Farrell and Jude Law filling his shoes every now and again. It's a stumbling, patchy movie that's interesting at moments but confounding in the end. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Invictus ★★★ For such a straightforward, often clumsy crowd-pleaser, Clint Eastwood's latest still feels like a marvel of restraint. Indeed, Invictus is an exercise in doing less with more. Recently elected Nelson Mandela (Morgan Freeman) seeks to reconcile a deeply divided South Africa by rallying the public behind their largely white rugby team, which had long been considered a symbol of institutionalized racism. Like Eastwood's Flags of Our Fathers, Invictus is about how cynical, insincere political calculations are often necessary to serve the greater good. Eastwood's not great at shooting sports, but he gets a sly, complicated performance out of Freeman, and there's some predictably fine, understated work from Matt Damon as the team captain. This should've been the hokiest movie ever made, but Eastwood plays it quietly and close to the vest. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

It's Complicated ★★★ There's such a lightness to Meryl Streep's work these days—even in something as wretched as Mamma Mia!—that she seems to be having the time of her life. Same goes for Alec Baldwin, whose middle-aged paunch has unleashed his inner comedian. Writer/director Nancy Meyers honestly doesn't have to do much besides put these dynamos together and let them riff. Playing a couple that's been divorced for a decade, Streep and Baldwin drunkenly hook up the night before their son's college graduation and spend the rest of the movie negotiating the horny aftershocks. Baldwin's remarried to a bitchy younger woman (Lake Bell, harshly photographed to give Streep the advantage) while Meryl finds herself in a tentative courtship with Steve Martin's sensitive architect. Like most Meyers movies, this one wallows uncomfortably in ostentatious displays of wealth. But there's no denying the giddy chemistry between Streep and Baldwin. They're both having so much fun it's contagious. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

All the World's a Stage

Curtain Call

Terry Gilliam's The Imaginarium of Dr. Parnassus is a flight of fancy that never really takes off.

Me and Orson Welles ★★ ½ The problem here is the "me." Adapted from Robert Kaplow's novel about the founding of the Mercury Theatre in 1937, loosey-goosey director Richard Linklater's latest film finds the least interesting avenue possible into a fascinating story. While young prodigy Welles (played with brilliant, boozy bombast by Christian McKay) struggles with his soon-to-be legendary stage revision of Julius Caesar, Linklater's picture chooses to focus on the romantic travails of a bit player, a role assumed with no discernible charisma by teenage heartthrob Zac Efron. Will Claire Danes' unspeakably boring secretary deign to deflower young Zac? And does anyone care that Welles is about to kick-start his career? Linklater seems to sense our ambivalence, as a gigantic chunk of the movie is devoted to replicating Welles' landmark production, with plenty of room for the uncanny James Tupper as Joseph Cotten. Me and Orson Welles often plays like 1930s fan-fiction, with Efron's tedious drama occasionally interrupting the story. (In the suburbs.)

The Men Who Stare at Goats ★★ ½ Half-formed comedic conceits spray like buckshot across director Grant Heslov's disappointingly cartoonish adaptation of Jon Ronson's exposé on the madness of military psych-ops. Ewan McGregor, who narrates every damn moment of the film, plays a depressed reporter following George Clooney's possibly insane ex-soldier into Baghdad during the early days of the Iraq War. On the road, Clooney tells a tale of the New Earth Army, a top-secret unit that attempted to train cadets in the paranormal arts. Believe it or not, most of this stuff is true. Unfortunately, Heslov's direction cheapens the material by going for broad buffoonery and slapstick where precision is required. Jeff Bridges recycles too many Dude-isms as a hippie squad leader, while Kevin Spacey tiresomely twirls his moustache as a cardboard villain. Everybody's mugging for the camera, but Clooney almost saves the film singlehandedly. Deftly deadpanning outrageous monologues, he plays it straight and sad, improbably getting us invested in this silliness. (In the suburbs.)

Nine ★ Rob Marshall is back with a desultory take on Federico Fellini's 8 ½, and it's a travesty. Much like Marshall's pitifully unimaginative adaptation of Chicago, Nine is a musical for people who hate musicals, again confining the singing and dancing numbers to a black soundstage that exists only in the imagination—because God forbid anybody burst into song in a musical. Fellini's playfully sad reverie has been adapted by Michael Tolkin and the late Anthony Minghella, two desperately serious screenwriters who make the fatal mistake of treating a comic predicament as the stuff of grand tragedy. Daniel Day-Lewis might be our greatest living actor, but he couldn't possibly be more wrong for this role, replacing Marcello Mastroianni's debauched delight with angst, hand-wringing and temper tantrums. He also seems about as Italian as a shepherd's pie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Road ★★ If you've read Cormac McCarthy's Pulitzer-Prize–winning novel, you're probably wondering how it could possibly lend itself to a satisfying adaptation. The relentlessly grim tale of a man and his young son wandering through a post-apocalyptic wasteland, McCarthy's book is a collection of unsettling anecdotes lacking the kind of forward momentum that movies require. Rendered faithfully here by director John Hillcoat, The Road is a miserable slog through an ashen, ruined landscape, punctuated by random attacks from redneck cannibals. Viggo Mortensen stars as the father, appearing emaciated and ill, reciting chunks of the novel's prose in voiceover. Charlize Theron appears briefly in flashback as the mother, fleshing out a couple scenes McCarthy only suggested. Hillcoat supplies images of magnificent desolation, but it's still a hopeless dirge with no variation in tone. A guy and his kid pushing a shopping cart toward certain doom worked on the page, but the film leaves an audience with no point of entry. One note played well is still only one note. (At Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

A Serious Man ★★★★ Grappling with mysteries on a deceptively mundane stage, the latest gem from Joel and Ethan Coen is about the silence of God. Set in a Minneapolis suburb circa 1967, the film stars Michael Stuhlbarg as a college physics professor and human doormat whose entire life begins to crumble one day with the kind of one-thing-after-another momentum that the Coens typically apply to their crime pictures. It's The Book of Job according to a couple of wisenheimer skeptics. Larry's search for celestial explanation leads him up the hierarchy of local rabbis in a series of agonizingly funny and fruitless counseling sessions and rambling parables. As usual, the Coens are being dismissed in some circles as snickering, nihilistic yuksters. But such a reading willfully ignores A Serious Man's deliberately open-ended, questioning structure. In the end, do any of us really have any choice but to accept the mystery? (In the suburbs.)

Sherlock Holmes ★★★ ½ Folks who grew up on the tweedy elegance of Basil Rathbone's 1940s B-movies might quibble with director Guy Ritchie's presentation of Sherlock Holmes (Robert Downey Jr.) as a loutish, bare-knuckle-brawling, manic-depressive. However, I found the film to be the most pleasant surprise I've had at the theater since Star Trek. It's a jaunty, very funny picture. So often in action movies brainpower is synonymous with weakness, but the script presents intelligence as just another form of bad-assery, with Holmes using his encyclopedic knowledge of human anatomy to overcome foes twice his size. Downey and Jude Law's Watson have the easy, bristling chemistry of an old married couple, and Sherlock's only problems arrive when the screenplay keeps them apart. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

2012 ★★ With films like Independence Day, Godzilla and The Day After Tomorrow under his belt, director Roland Emmerich obviously has a hankering for mass destruction. With a plot based on the Mayan calendar's prediction of an apocalypse, this is his silliest fetishization of annihilation yet. John Cusack stars as a failed sci-fi writer and deadbeat dad who somehow finds time to patch things up with his family while speeding through earthquakes and outrunning flowing volcanoes. Danny Glover plays the sad sack president charged with preserving civilization as his pragmatic aide (Oliver Platt) butts heads with Chiwetel Ejiofor's idealistic scientist. If there's anything harrowing about hundreds of millions of people dying horrible deaths, this cheerfully tasteless movie doesn't dwell on it. Instead we get some plucky heroics, garish stereotypes and one extremely lucky dog. Most of the world perishes, but at least Cusack's daughter learns to stop wetting the bed. (In the suburbs.)

The Twilight Saga: New Moon ★ And you thought the first one was terrible? This second installment of Stephenie Meyer's awful ode to sexual repression is so glum, dreary and snail-paced, it feels like it plays in slow-motion. Pining, as always, for sparkly vampire Edward Cullen (Robert Pattinson, still looking vaguely embarrassed to be here), Kristen Stewart's depressed Bella pouts, whines and stares off into space a lot. With Edward out of the picture for most of the running time, she tries to distract herself with the happy, shirtless visage of Taylor Lautner's Jacob. But Bella has rotten luck with boys, as every guy who takes a shine to her seems to end up being some sort of supernatural beast. Though his waxed chest might lead you to believe otherwise, Jacob is actually a werewolf, and so we suffer through more of Meyer's lame mythology and lots of annoying emo posturing. It takes an awfully long time for nothing to happen in New Moon. (In the suburbs.)

Up in the Air ★★★ ½ Director Jason Reitman's sturdy, crowd-pleasing adaptation of Walter Kirn's novel is best when it allows George Clooney to subtly toy with and deconstruct his tabloid persona. Clooney stars as a blissfully single corporate tool who spends 300 days a year flying from town to town, firing folks whenever their cowardly bosses need to outsource the axing. Streamlined, efficient and preaching a gospel of "no luggage," Clooney meets his match in Vera Farmiga's randy road warrior and finds himself forced to rethink his philosophy when Anna Kendrick's up-and-coming protégée threatens his way of life. It's slick, classy entertainment, more beholden to Billy Wilder than Judd Apatow. Reitman's occasional bouts of glibness are no match for Clooney's seemingly effortless, soul-searching work. The handsome bastard is able to suggest sudden, midlife bouts of yearning without making a big show of it. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The White Ribbon ★★★ Michael Haneke, the harsh, professorial director behind Funny Games and Caché, loves to punish his audience. His latest, which won the Palme D'Or at last year's Cannes Film Festival, is no exception. Filmed in high-contrast black-and-white with Haneke's usual air of viciousness and lack of music, The White Ribbon tells the sad, elliptical tale of a small pre-WWI German town infected with casual sadism. There's something reminiscent of Village of the Damned in Haneke's presentation of the town's children, tormented by their vicious, dictatorial parents until animal abuse and casual acts of torture are practically inevitable. Like his other films, there's a dazzling command of formal cinematic technique in the service of a one-note thesis. Haneke's attempting to depict Nazism in prepubescent form. The White Ribbon is a bit too easy and pleased with itself but still impossible to shake. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

Youth in Revolt ★★ Michael Cera's gawky, stammering virgin routine proved hilarious in Superbad and earned him incalculable goodwill on Arrested Development. Yet he seems stuck in first gear, delivering identical performances in every project since. Based on the novel by CD Payne, Miguel Arteta's latest is a bumbling mess, but at least it allows Cera to add a few shadings on his patented persona. Cera starts as Nick Twisp, mopey son to a slatternly mother (Jean Smart) who endures countless humiliations from her trashy boyfriends. One summer, Nick flips head over heels for Sheeni Saunders (fetching newcomer Portia Doubleday). In a desperate attempt to woo the sophisticated, promiscuous Sheeni, Nick invents an alternate persona named François Dillinger, a mouthy arsonist with a yen for cigarettes and vehicular mayhem. It's as this rowdy alter ego that Cera finally breaks out, using voluminous profanity and an acerbic attitude that's hilarious when emanating from his wispy frame and baby-face. SEA CHANGE

John Brown's Body weathers storms.

John Brown's Body plays House of Blues Feb. 5.

A BOSTON-ROOTED REGGAE band couldn't find itself in a better spot. Tommy Benedetti, drummer and cofounder of John Brown's Body, is calling from the beach in Jamaica before his group climbs back aboard the Jam Cruise.

"We have one of the prime slots on a cruise—we're playing at five o'clock on the pool deck as the boat departs from Jamaica," Benedetti says. "People are going to be amped."

Benedetti's clearly amped as well. "There are a bunch of people on the boat who really love music and have pretty wide ears," he says of the jam-happy January cruise, featuring such diverse artists as STS9, Dark Star Orchestra, Maceo Parker and John Medeski. "It's always good to play to a newer crowd, so I'm excited."

John Brown's Body, which returns on Feb. 5 to House of Blues (where it drew 1,800 fans last April), has been playing to newer, larger crowds for nearly 15 years.

Fans recognize the real deal. Initially inspired by '70s roots reggae, the octet has given the tag "future roots" to its now-denser, still-ebullient, modernized reggae, which draws on hip-hop as well as electro-dub.

"We're using the building blocks [of reggae] but taking it from there with different beats and textures," says Benedetti, 38. "It's a pretty aggressive show, very energized. It's not kick-back-and-drink-a-fruity-drink reggae. That's not JBB style."

In fact, the band, named after abolitionist John Brown, only toughened and expanded its sound on its standout 2008 CD Amplify, which debuted at No. 1 on Billboard's reggae chart. The group took it further last year with Re-Amplify, getting producers like Dubmatix, Blue King Brown and GoldieLocks to remix tracks, even inspiring JBB to retool some live arrangements. "It just opens up the possibilities and ways to play your music that you may not have really thought of before," Benedetti says.

JBB forged its new groove despite some destabilizing events. When original lead singer Kevin Kinsella left the band after 2005's Pressure Points, harmony vocalist Elliot Martin stepped up to become frontman, though he had to deal with throat surgery. The worst blow came when bassist Scott Palmer died from cancer in 2006.

> "It's inspiring and really satisfying to wake up and know that your job for the day is to play music for people."

Other band members opted to drop out. But JBB soldiered on, adding bassist Nate Edgar, keyboardist Matthew "Kofi" Goodwin and new horn players to the longtime base of Martin, Benedetti and guitarist Mike Keenan.

"Obviously we've weathered a bunch of storms over the years, and it's inspiring and really satisfying to wake up and know that your job for the day is to play music for people," Benedetti says. "We went through all the changes, and it really was a rebirth for the band.

"There was definitely a period of doubt, but we knew we had work to do," he adds. "The band that we have right now is so incredibly solid, and the musicianship is off the charts. It's a real family vibe. That's what John Brown's Body has always been."

It's been a long journey since Ithaca, N.Y., native Kinsella moved to Boston with his roots reggae combo Tribulations and met up with Martin in 1989. The group morphed into John Brown's Body in 1995, shortly after Benedetti joined with fellow Berklee music students.

In the late '90s, JBB's sound was sunnier, with lyrics touting reggae's spiritual inspirations. Martin still delivers conscious lyrics, his voice shifting from resonant singing to rhythmic raps, but the musical treatments have grown to the forefront as well.

"The band is more easily digestible for some people than it would have been in the past," Benedetti says. "It's not coming at people from a preachy angle. Elliot writes social-commentary lyrics, but we try not to get too specific—we're obviously not Rastafarians—or pretend to be anything we're not."

The Somerville resident adds that "it keeps on getting better," with recent JBB tours in England and New Zealand. "Playing new places and playing to new fans and reaching new plateaus, it's pretty humbling." ✖✖✖

Riding the New Wave

Bossa Nova Casanovas

If music were a high-school romance, Nouvelle Vague would be the angsty punk-rocker who meets the sultry exchange-student. The group takes cult classics—from bands like the Clash, Depeche Mode and Buzzcocks—and gives them sexy, exotic makeovers. Led by French producer/arranger duo Marc Collin and Olivier Libaux, Nouvelle Vague sports an ever-changing lineup of female singers in whimsical covers that are as striking as they are brash. Enjoy this unconventional love affair on Jan. 24 at the Somerville Theater.

You have a nice welcome note when someone searches for your Foundation. It says

WE NEVER STOP CARING! WHEN YOU SAVE A LIFE YOU SAVE THE FUTURE.

Allow me to congratulate for this mission because you put it in practice, you do not only say it. Today, my objective is to thank you so much for paying my heart surgery.

Mr Tye with Erneste

I would like to be a doctor when I grow up and help other as you helped me. I wish to be a cardiologist, and I will like to come back to the United States for my college education.

I thank you once again for helping me and my God already blessed you.

Thanks.
Erneste.

Dear Erneste,

Thank you for your beautiful note.

YOU ARE THE FUTURE.

I hope that as you grow up you realize that helping someone else is the greatest mission you can have.

God bless you,

Ray Tye

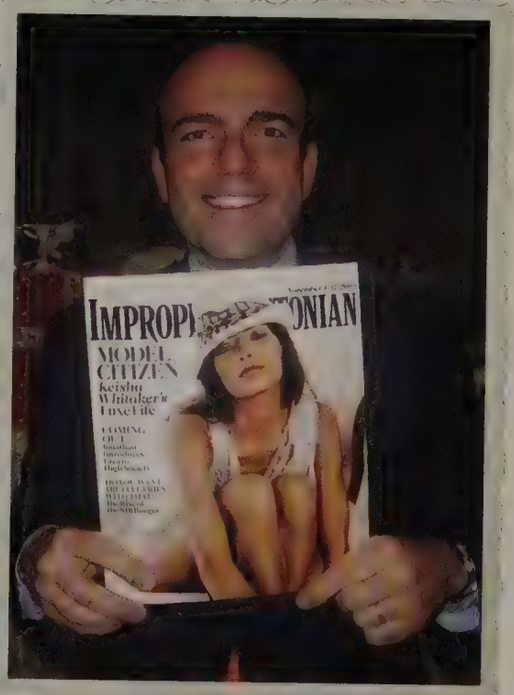
ATTENTION, BOUNTY HUNTERS! BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER SCREAMING LIKE A BABY ON THE INFAMOUS CRESTA RUN AT THE ST. MORITZ TOBOGGANING CLUB, OPEN THROUGH FEB. 28 IN ST. MORITZ, SWITZERLAND.

Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.



To celebrate the 20th anniversary of the fall of the Berlin Wall, Karina Bumagin and Sam Melkonian visited the Brandenburg Gate and saluted the victory of consumer capitalism (embodied here by our Holiday Shopping Issue).

Debra Mascott and the volunteers at the St. Bernard Project in New Orleans helped fix the damage wrought by Hurricane Katrina, but they couldn't do anything about the damage wrought by eating too much crawfish étouffée.

Meghan Allen and Jason Coscia knew they had come of age in Western Samoa when they stopped getting carded at the packie.

Gary Alexander, Rhode Island's Secretary of the Executive Office of Health and Human Services, shows us a picture of a healthy human.

SOMER(VILLE) NIGHTS

Le Plus Ça Change...

A long-standing holiday custom among blue-bloods and Brahmins, the Winter Ball, held at the Park Plaza, is either a beloved holiday tradition or not quite what it used to be, depending on whom you ask.

"When I was young, we had to wear floor-length gowns," recalled one thoroughbred. "Now, these girls practically have their mons pubis hanging out." Another said (aghast), "What's that girl wearing—a beauty pageant dress?!?" Then there was the bright young thing who remarked, "This is where my mother used to send me to look for an appropriate husband. Thank God I didn't find one."

Catty comments aside, and despite the absence of debutantes in a receiving line (apparently, not enough girls wanted to come out in the non-lesbian sense this year), it was a memorable evening. Among the usual suspects on-hand: brunette stunner Molly Storer (who flew in from California an hour before the ball and got ready at the Chilton Club), the puckish Teddy Talbot, Chestnut Hill beauty Blake Whitney, tall, dark and gorgeous Julie-Hume Gordon, the terrible twosome of Parker and Hunter Treacy, aristo-Brit Andrew McIlwraith and his dishy wife, Tish, blonde Beacon Hellion Julia Owens and her other half, Michael Raymo, one man who forgot his cufflinks and had to staple his shirt together, and a woman who said, "I'm so glad the tax on Botox isn't going through. They're doing tanning beds instead."

Surveying the crowd, one 40-something said to a friend, "Don't you wish you were young again?" to which the friend answered, "No."

"With your parents paying all the bills?"

"In that case, yes."

Meanwhile, proof that no matter how far we've come from the days of white gloves and chaperones, a certain Yankee upper crust survives, the following exchange took place between a mother and her daughter: "Go find your cousins."

"They're all married."

"Yes, I know. To each other."

Oh, Holy Night!

For many people, Jesus is their personal savior. Well, not to brag, and meaning no disrespect, but I happen to be Jesus' personal savior—in an incident that took place in Somerville, of all places. But we'll get to that.

Molly Storer and Alex Feldman at the Winter Ball

Julie-Hume Gordon and Julia Owens at the Winter Ball

Blake Whitney and Parker Treacy at the Winter Ball

The Christmas Lights Tour begins!

Soroff saves Jesus.

A decorated house in Somerville

It all began at 29 Newbury, which is the traditional pre-game spot for an annual Christmas Lights Tour that a revolving group of friends and I have been doing for the past 15 years or so.

After lubricating liberally with martinis and such, we boarded a limousine that, quite frankly, resembled the rental-car shuttles at the airport, but we were well-fortified with Champagne, snacks and holiday cheer.

For the past few seasons, we'd concentrated our tour on the Fellsway in Saugus, so this year, we decided to change it up. With a bit of craft, one of us wheedled The Somerville Arts Council into giving us a map of the town's most extravagantly decorated houses, and we were off like a herd of Vikings.

It's difficult to overstate the level of spectacle we encountered, although admittedly we made a spectacle of ourselves by stopping at the house where President Obama lived as a grad student and singing carols with more volume than finesse.

It was astonishing: homes festooned with a blinding array of lights and all manner of Santas (some riding motorcycles), reindeer (some wearing sunglasses) and snowmen (some carrying mugs of hot chocolate), not to mention assorted Disney characters, angels of every description, elves, choo-choo trains, candy canes, animatronic mice and Dickensian carolers.

Then, of course, there were the crèches, which ranged from elegantly carved wood to cartoonish plastic figurines, and which brings me to the point of my story.

Two days prior, there had been a heavy snowstorm, and as we inspected one lawn decorated to a fare-thee-well, I noticed that the baby Jesus in the light-up nativity scene was buried under six inches of powder. With no regard for my personal safety (or the fact that I was trespassing), I climbed over the fence and dusted him off so the poor little savior could breathe.

In other words, I saved Jesus.

And if it seems unlikely that a gay agnostic raised in the Jewish faith (although my mother was the original Arctic blonde WASP) could accomplish such a feat... well, just consider it a good old-fashioned Christmas miracle.

After all, Jesus is the reason for the season. ✖✖✖

Wink, Wink

I met my husband at age 14, back when high-tech meant a banana-sized car phone and breakups happened by land line. Now you can "get rejected by seven different technologies," as Drew Barrymore puts it in He's Just Not That Into You. Of course, you can also find love through these portals; my younger sister served as a bridesmaid in two Match.com weddings. Still, my single friends here report that the world of winks hasn't made dating any easier.

I can't give much in the way of advice, having been benched for years. But I can present The Improper's annual list of bachelors and bachelorettes (send us your fan mail, and we'll pass it along). The 2010 class includes a lacrosse player, a professor, a musician, a filmmaker, a TV reporter, a pastry chef and the actress gracing our cover. Plus, a top advisor to newly elected U.S. Senator Scott Brown. Who, come to think of it, should ask his boss for help. We hear daughter Ayla had been flooded with offers.

CUCKOO FOR COLD COCOA

MIKE DUNFORD describes Cocoa Metro, the chocolate milk he and his wife, Lizzy, produce, in two words: "It's serious." Using five times as much chocolate—Belgian Callebaut—as their big-name competitors and all-natural milk from a Vermont dairy, Cocoa Metro evokes terms usually reserved for illegal drugs. "We do live demos at Whole Foods [where it's sold]," Dunford recounts, "and the first thing [tasters] do is look at me, pause and say, 'That's dangerous.'" Proving that obsession might be genetic, he has to order an extra shipment for his own family. "My eight- and four-year-old love it. We're addicted."

Study in Contrasts

The problem with most baked Alaskas is a lack of contrast among the sweet layers. Not so Maura Kilpatrick's version, which features thick, silky meringue, dense coconut ice-cream and a crispy, chewy macaroon. The dessert delights from top to bottom, and, until spring, is the next best thing to romancing in Oleana's garden. It even comes with passion-fruit caramel. ELIZABETH BOMZE

Drink of the Moment

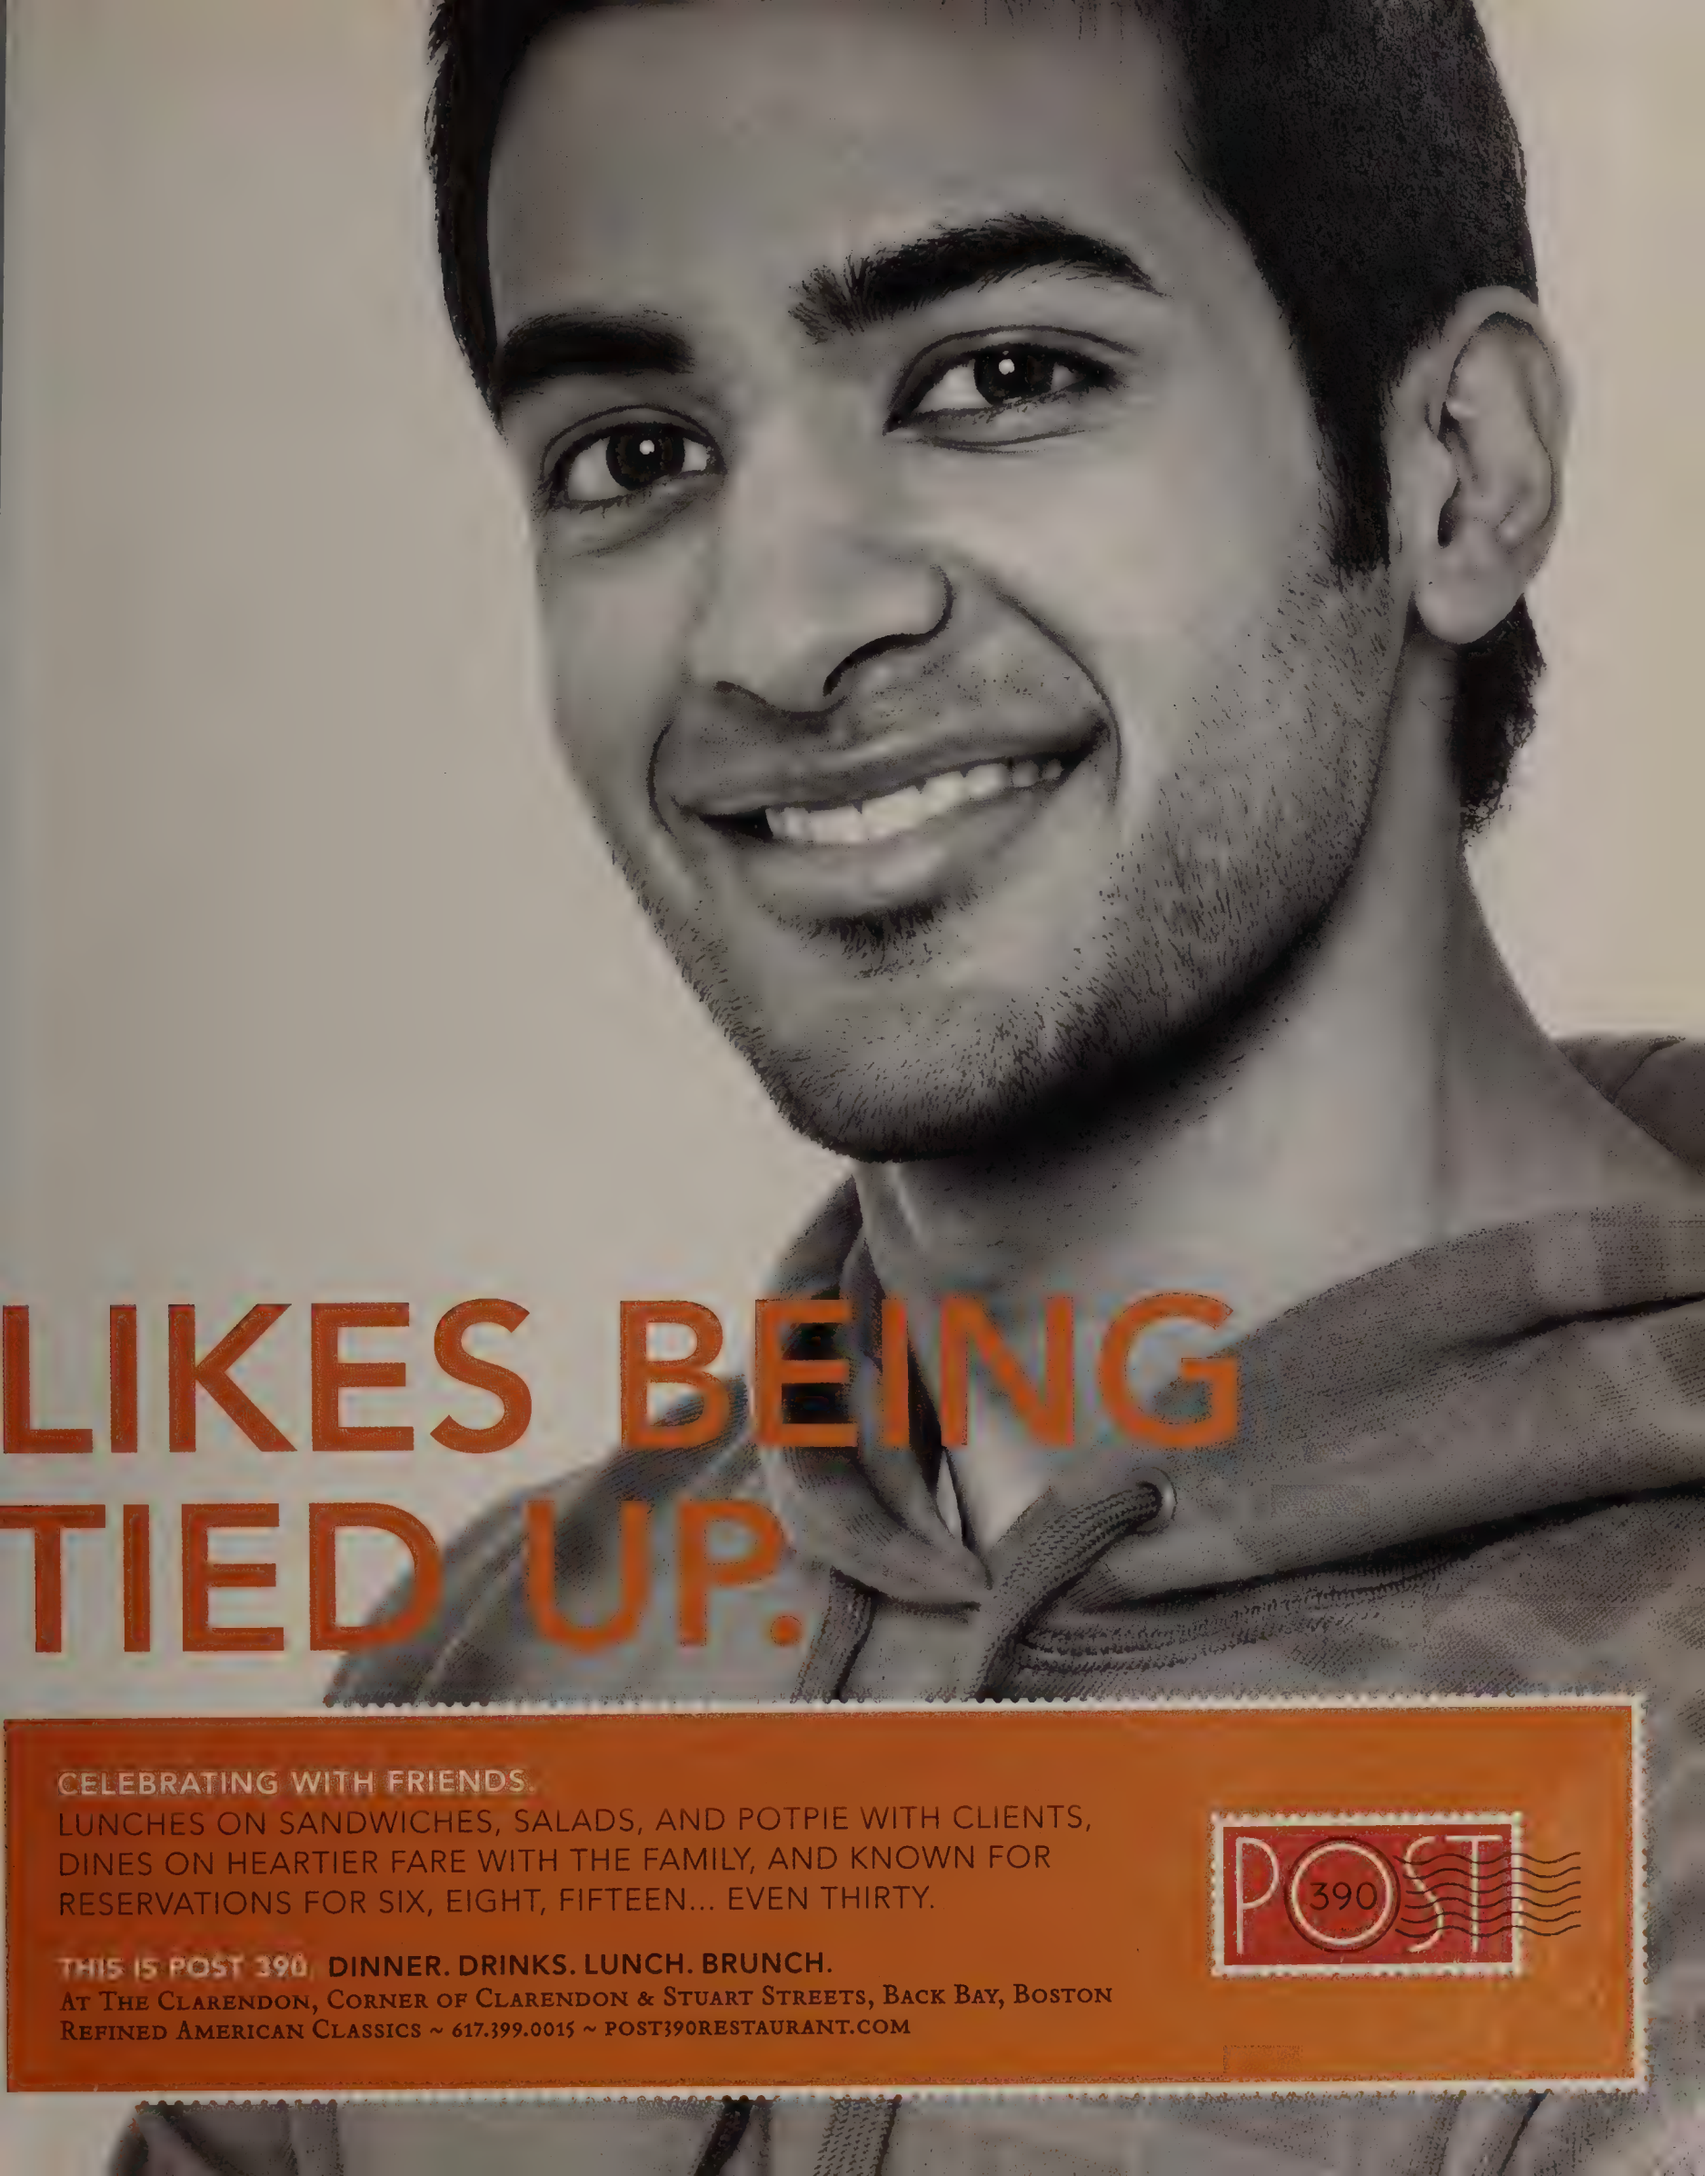
Pops Stars

Visiting the bar at the redesigned Pops in the South End, a drinker might not know what concoction to choose. For that instance, there's the CHEF'S STAFF DRINK ($12.50), a name that might as well be Pick This One.

Invented by boss man Felino Samson, the cocktail's composed of Dewar's, Mathilde Framboise and ginger beer. "I like Scotch, but I can't sit there and drink a lot of it," Samson says. "This is a lighter drink. A little tamer." As such, each sip begins dark and smoky before quickly rising to a raspberry finish. It's a Marlboro Red in a dainty cigarette holder.

The unusual recipe has raised a few doubts. "When we first talked about it, I was like, 'Ugh, I don't know,'" bar manager Terry O'Donnell admits. "Then tasting it, it was fantastic."

Customers may have a similar reaction to the ABSINTHE "HORCHATA" ($12.50), made from absinthe, cinnamon schnapps, almond syrup, almond milk and drops of orange-blossom water. With absinthe's anise aspect, there's a Good & Plenty quality to the pearly pink drink.



"It's rich, wintery; it's nutty but still kind of fruity with the licorice," describes Samson, who created the menu with a focus on balancing tastes and complementing flavors. Which is why it only takes him a half-count to suggest a pairing: grilled espresso lamb chop with goat-cheese mash ($16).

"Because when you order a Sambuca, they put the three beans of espresso in there; it just enhances the flavor," O'Donnell explains. Seems like the team's on the same page after all. NICK ALTSCHULLER

WHAT TO GET YOUR PARTNER for Valentine's Day

WHETHER OR NOT ANYONE IS attracted to me based on my looks is trivial when compared [with] my enjoyment of having a healthy body. The bliss that comes from knowing how to breathe, having a strong core and being present with my partner is a million times more important than having rock-hard celebrity abs. Real sexiness is a vibe that comes from knowing all this. That is why it's comfortable for me to walk onto a comedy stage naked. The cure is to practice. Find places where it's acceptable to be bare-skinned, and just try it. Maybe start in a gym locker room with your own gender. If that's no big deal, try a nude beach or resort. In the summer, I go to the Ledges in southern Vermont or Solair in western Mass. On Feb. 3, come to the Naked Comedy Showcase at ImprovBoston, and when I invite an audience member to tell a joke in the nude, you'll be ready.

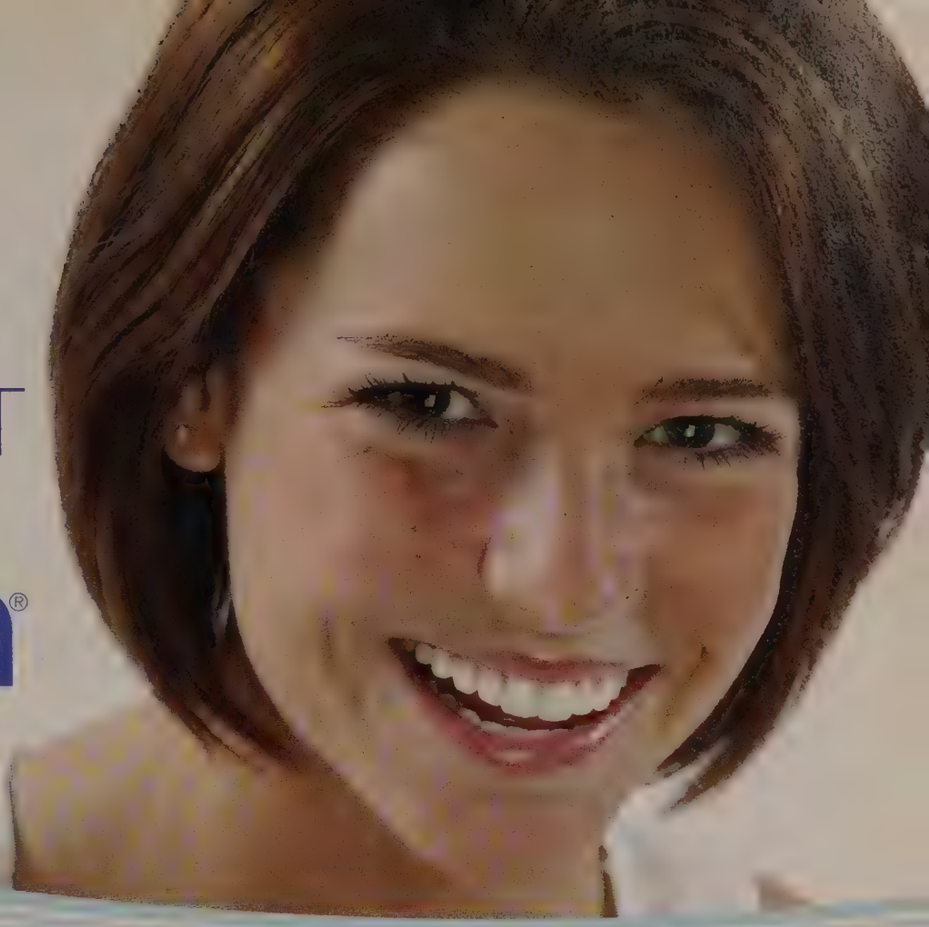
YES, WE CANTEEN

Slow-meets-fast food

WHERE AND WHAT is Canteen: Environmentally Friendly Café? Conceptually, it's where fast food dances with Slow Food. Geographically, it's where Harvard Square merges into Central Square. Canteen will be located at 983 Mass. Ave., where co-owner Jimmy Murray is building "what Harvard Square really needs: a different sort of cafe, my little pet project," as he describes it.



"I've drawn a lot of inspiration from Alice Waters and Slow Food," he says. "We [Murray and ex-banker friend Aaron Siegel] don't employ a corporate mentality." Although the concept is "basically, a gourmet sandwich platform: five hot, five cold and five breakfast sandwiches," Canteen will also feature warm entrée salads, light entrées and all-day breakfast, incorporating non–fast-food elements such as organic eggs, fresh flageolet beans and merguez sausage. No plastic is allowed. "All disposables are completely compostable, made from corn," he says. Expect an early March opening.

A HAPPY STORY in hard times: Prose in Arlington remains "open for the foreseeable future," according to owner Debbie Shore, who'd planned to close at year's end. Shore had reluctantly e-mailed customers that she couldn't afford to renew her beer-and-wine license, and thus her decision to shutter the restaurant. Cue the fans. "Three people came in and said they refused to let me close," Shore recounts. "They shoved a couple grand down my bra," she continues with a throaty laugh, "and dragged me to town hall" to pay for a 2010 license.

FINALLY, congratulations to Henrietta's Table chef Peter Davis and coauthor Alexandra Hall, whose cookbook Fresh & Honest has won first prize in its category from the New England Book Festival.

"I'M JUST TRYING TO RAISE THE BAR IN PEOPLE'S MINDS."

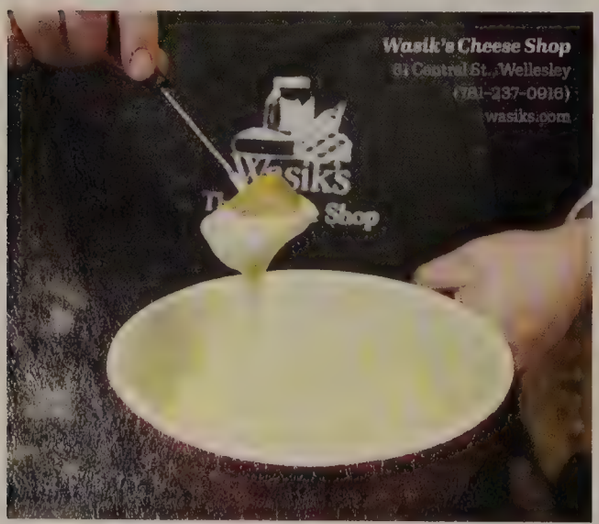
284 Washington St., Brookline
cuttyfoods.com

Cutty's, Charles Kelsey's sandwich shop in Brookline Village, is founded on a food memory that could be described as Bourdain-esque. There's the salty fisherman and the oyster straight from the sea. "That set the bar," he says, in regard to his approach to taste. "And you should expect your Italian meats to have a depth of flavor besides meat and fat. I'm just trying to raise the bar in people's minds."

Kelsey, 33, has the experience and a wealth of ideas from his past as an editor and test cook at Cook's Illustrated and a writer for Gourmet. Distilled from his work in snazzy cuisine is his desire to serve the simple. "I can make anything I want in the high-end world, and all I want is a great sandwich," he explains, adding, "We need a sandwich—and I'd love to be the one to come up with this—that is identified with Boston."



Contenders include chicken salad with crackling; egg salad with radishes and oven-dried olives; and porchetta with garlic confit and pickled fennel. His personal favorite could be a Saturday special of Philly-style roast pork with broccoli rabe and sharp provolone. Prices at Cutty's, slated to open this month, will be in the $6–$8 dollar range.

Of course, the fennel will be pickled in-house, the mustard will be handmade, standard practice in today's dining scene. But lunch is different. You don't expect your ham and cheese to be prepared by a sous chef who interned at Clio. Still to some, the sandwich is sacred. Says Kelsey, "In my mind, it's not gourmet. It's just the way things should be done." NICK ALTSCHULLER

Melting Away

Brad Wasik hauls an 80-pound wheel of cave-aged Gruyère up from his shop's curing cellar to demonstrate how large it can be. According to his admittedly romantic ideal, it's the product of long, cold winters, when cheesemakers needed a big enough stash to last until spring. In the meantime, meals consisted of melted Swiss, stale bread and wine—still the basics for fondue and a good excuse to stay home. ELIZABETH BOMZE

WASIK'S CHEESE FONDUE

Enjoy with a crusty baguette, apples, broccoli, potatoes and summer sausage; a crisp, acidic Alsatian white wine; and a lightly dressed salad.

Serves 3–4 as a main course

INGREDIENTS:

1 clove	fresh garlic, peeled
1½ cups	dry white wine
1 tablespoon	fresh lemon juice
½ pound	shredded aged Gruyère
¼ pound	shredded aged Emmental
¼ pound	shredded aged Appenzeller

Freshly grated nutmeg, pepper and/or paprika to taste

1 tablespoon	cornstarch
3 tablespoons	Kirsch

DIRECTIONS:

Rub ceramic or earthenware fondue pot with garlic. Add wine and lemon juice. Over a low to medium burner, slowly add shredded cheese by handfuls, stirring constantly with wooden spoon until smooth and melted. Bring fondue to bubble briefly and add spices, stirring until blended. Stir together cornstarch and Kirsch until slurry forms, and add to fondue, allowing to gently boil for another 15 to 30 seconds.

FUNNY FARM

A dad raises gerbils and a family.

THERE'S SOMETHING ABOUT author Holly Robinson's father Donald, a Navy commander gone gerbil farmer, that's both admirable and droll. His paternal style is one of barked commands: "Don't jump on the couch." "Be quiet so I can think." You can imagine him in a movie adaptation not realizing the audience is laughing at him. His wife's response is one of classic, tipped-back irony, even impatient disdain, as she watches her husband's crackpot-seeming scheme of raising up to 9,000 of these "pocket kangaroos" on their 100-acre farm. Is this a midlife-crisis hobby or a serious business venture?

At first, it's an embarrassing secret. Holly strikes an appealing balance: There's teenagerish OMG, but then she finds herself helping to care for the gerbils and appreciating their personalities: "Gerbils are also great communicators. If a gerbil rolls onto its back in front of another gerbil, it wants a grooming session." She has a secret gerbil named Kinky of her own, "illegally" removed from the pack for real pethood.

WELL-BRED Author Holly Robinson

The Gerbil Farmer's Daughter
By Holly Robinson

This memoir takes place in West Brookfield, Mass.

Robinson portrays her dad's military-style singleness of purpose with just enough fondness. Along the way, her mother grabs a whiff of feminist independence and opens a horse-riding stable. And as the family farm burgeons with animals and growing, rebellious kids, her dad's sometimes-mocked enterprise achieves great success in the scientific realm. In providing these woolly creatures for research, he indeed becomes "the world's largest producer" of gerbils. So who's laughing now? Robinson shows that her father's quirky-obsessive qualities helped give her a homemade education that nurtured her own enterprising and optimistic spirit. And to that she has added an observant sparkle and irony that Navy Dad couldn't repress. ×××

FILM SCHOOL

Nick's chick-flick survival guide

WOMEN FULLY EMBRACE the term "chick flick." That was the first surprise as I began my research, and it's the fact that may prove key to the whole enterprise.

For the ladies, let me explain the central conceit to guys' movies: They appeal to our survival fantasies. Pit one man (Under Siege) or men (Hoosiers) against seemingly insurmountable odds (terrorists, South Bend Central High School), and you have a film that we'll quote ad nauseum decades after its release.

For the men, deciphering what women see in chick flicks could help us endure the occasional saccharine overdose. So, like a cross between Roger Ebert and Jane Goodall, I took the apes to the movies. (First lesson: Women hate that analogy.)

My study began with My Sister's Keeper, the story of a young girl with leukemia and the sister born to serve as her donor. With me was my friend Casey, who had read the book and informed me, "I started crying on page six. I couldn't even finish the last chapter." Can't wait, I thought, opening the case to a film so sappy the DVD could've been made from candied maple syrup.

Before hitting play, I needed the ground rules. What should a guy do if his female companion starts to weep? "I would be insulted if you made fun of me—I know it's ridiculous," Casey said. "And don't be like, 'Oh, it's OK.' I'm not going to lose sleep tonight." Yeah, but that wouldn't be the worst time for a man to make a move, right? I mean, that's part of the chick-flick appeal—there's an element of romance. "I suppose you could take advantage if you really wanted to." Well, that just makes it sound sordid.

As the cancer escalated and the voiceovers churned out lines like, "Everyone was so worried about my blood counts, they barely even noticed that Jesse was dyslexic," the movie changed from chick flick to farce. So days later, I decided it was time to bring out the big guns: The Notebook and Susan, who had a feasible cinema theory of her own.

"You need relationship equality," she explained. "In the bad ones, it's mostly about the women, and the guy is a caricature: either Prince Charming or a dick." Therefore: Bride Wars = bad, (500) Days of Summer = good. In contrast, she had a second, less fair-minded idea: "I haven't done the statistical analysis, but the people that champion crappy chick flicks are unhappy in their own relationships, or state of unrelationship—God, I sound like a horrible person." Yes, you do, but it keeps me from stating such things.

Speaking of horrible, have you seen The Notebook? In terms of relationship equality, I found Rachel McAdams and Ryan Gosling identically irritating. Why is this the quintessential chick flick? According to Susan, "'Cause Ryan Gosling is hot and manly and sexy and caring." OK, OK, that's enough.

Words delicately balanced between advice and admonishment came as we settled down for my final trial. "It's easy to make fun of The Notebook," she said. "What's not easy is letting yourself go." It would be a task made difficult due to the next movie being The Proposal. I might like A-Rod more than Sandra Bullock.

But I found untapped mental muscle memory, developed through years of ESPN. Announcers like Joe Morgan make me want to ice-pick my ear drums, but I still watch sports. The key is active disengagement, a sifting for nuggets of interest amid intolerable sludge. While watching Bullock stomp around in red-soled heels, I compulsively uttered, "Oh, she's wearing Blahniks."

"No, those are Louboutins," Susan corrected—she, clearly impressed, me, grateful I got that wrong.

Like a separate relationship issue, it helps to think about baseball. When you sit down and honestly pay attention to a game, there's maybe four minutes of compelling content within a three-hour span of triviality. But you find what you like and accept the filler. And in the same way, women see the silliness in chick flicks. They just need men to do something we're already trained for: Respect the absurdity. ✖✖✖

DADDY DEAREST

TO THAT DAD:
You must be so proud. She made the team. It doesn't matter if she doesn't deserve to be there. She may not have the skills, but she does have a connection. And that connection is you. That's all that you have ever wanted since she was cut from the middle-school team. "Yep, that's my kid. She's going to be on the varsity team; I'll make sure of it because I represent everything that's fair." In your mind, you think that you've done her a favor, but you couldn't be more wrong. She's on the team, and she doesn't have herself to thank. She has you. You must be so proud. Observers from afar

To "Wishing people were sweeter":
It is unfortunate that you do not have respect for your fellow commuters, nor are you schooled in manners. Perhaps you should think about your actions and how they are perceived by others around you, particularly those young people working on the commuter boat. There are many people who wait patiently in line for 15 or 20 minutes, some of whom are handicapped. You refer to a handicapped woman as "Paula Dean." You should learn about civility, manners and respect for everyone in this society, as the example you set is horrible. Wishing line-cutters were smarter

To the angel who found a driver's license in the South End:
You made my day, my week, maybe my year. I had dropped my license while running somewhere along Mass. Ave and the Southwest Corridor. I went out to do some errands, resigned to the idea of spending the next day at the registry. Imagine my delight when I got home to find that some Good, nay, Great Samaritan had schlepped to my house and slid it through my mail slot. Who does that? Best holiday gift ever.

A CASUAL AFFAIR

Woodward works as both a swank hangout and a downtown tavern.

POTTY MOUTH House-pickled veggies and short-rib pot roast

When you've worked in the restaurant business for more than three decades, people tend to recognize you. At least that was the explanation I got from Chris Schlesinger, who owns East Coast Grill in Inman Square. Schlesinger was approached by a number of friends and acquaintances as we ate at Woodward, the new restaurant in the Ames near Government Center. After chatting with some folks, including Beehive co-owner Darryl Settles, he settled into our leather booth with a Manhattan on the rocks. "As hard as this business is," he says, "it's been a great run."

Schlesinger credits East Coast Grill's success to good timing. Back then, he explained, "Nobody had live fire, so it was like we had discovered grilling." Since then, the eatery has expanded, and he has taken on (and let go of) several side projects, but his original concept still stands. In many ways it's restaurants like the Grill that have allowed places like Woodward to succeed.

"We opened at that time when folks were starting to understand that casual food can be good food," he said. Woodward is a step up from the down-and-dirty, grill-focused East Coast, but it's casual nonetheless. Despite its industrial size, the space is decorated in soft colors with a mix of folksy knickknacks displayed in glass cases, making the room feel like a chic library.

The menu, our server explained, features several small plates and larger shared options. After taking our order, she brought us a dish of house-pickled vegetables in lieu of bread service. Woodward chef Mark Goldberg stopped by to introduce himself to Schlesinger and admitted to pickling whatever he can get his hands on.

Hence the pickled ginger in the mignonette that accompanied the Island Creek oysters ($18); Schlesinger politely tasted the sauce, but kept it off his shellfish, opting instead for a hit of salt and pepper. "Oysters need to be cold and shucked well. They've done a nice job with these," he said. Next up, the chilled crab salad ($20), perfect for sharing with thick chunks of crab layered between bits of pomegranate, cantaloupe, citrus and cucumber. "Crab's a hard dish to do well," he said after a few bites, adding, "but this is really nice."

Next came the duck-confit flatbread ($16), a sweet and tangy combo of duck, dried cranberries and goat cheese. "That'll knock you out right there," Schlesinger said, pulling a slice from the massive pie. I asked if he normally dined at places like Woodward. "People are surprised to hear that chefs eat crappy food," he replied. "I think they want us to say we get up and make ourselves crab omelets." He revealed that Santarpio's Pizza and Frank's Steak House are favorite spots.

Which didn't stop him from showing appreciation for the work that went into each dish, including a handmade short-rib tortellini ($15) and a few slices of crispy mushroom toast ($11). Our favorite was the house-cured veal pastrami on rye ($17). As we each inhaled our half, Schlesinger talked about his former venture, the All-Star Sandwich Bar (he's since sold his stake in the business). "I'm one of those guys that when I have one restaurant I want two, and when I have two I want one," he said. "Turns out sandwiches are way more complicated than I thought they'd be."

But Schlesinger remains a connoisseur. "I'm curious how they cured this," he said about the pastrami. "It's nice and smoky." Later, when Woodward sous chef Cassidy Salus passed by our table, he asked for the recipe. Our final dish, the short-rib pot roast ($26) left us both a little wide-eyed at the damage we'd done. We decided to forgo dessert for a 10-year-old tawny port. "I like this place," he said, as we settled up. "It's got a good feel. It's a little industrial, but it's comfortable. I really think it works." ✖✖✖

AIR MARSHALS

Introducing the public fist of justice

FOR THE PAST MONTH, we've been dissecting the details of the so-called Underwear Bomber case, trying to figure out where our security apparatus let us down. While that's an important exercise for the relevant government agencies, this latest terrorism attempt has more basic implications for you and me, Joe and Jane Traveler. Because the take-home lesson from the Fruit of the Loom Bandit and, before that, Mr. Fussy-Shoes (I believe all terrorists should be branded with silly names) is that airline passengers are the last line of defense. As such, we all need to prepare to do our part when the time comes. This means understanding when, and how, to beat someone senseless on an airplane.

No matter what we do, terrorists are going to slip through the cracks. As soon as we start looking in people's underwear, they'll stop wearing it. Many people already have. Which brings me to a question. Since the Shoe Bomber, we've had to take off our shoes at security. Since the Underpants Bomber, we haven't had to take off our underpants (if we're wearing any). Why the discrepancy? Because I suspect that this guy didn't technically have the explosive in his underpants, if you know what I mean. I don't want to give away sensitive security information, but let's just say that if he got that fuse lit, it would've wrecked 'em—damn near killed 'em. So if we're going to profile, we can start with people who look like ass-bombers.

But say we don't catch the next guy who has a bomb in his hat, or up his nose. Then it's up to us to use any tools available to thwart his plan. For example, you might call those things on your shoes "shoelaces." I call them "terrorist stranglers," and as soon as I get on a plane, I take one from my shoe and wrap it around each fist. So I'm ready when the guy in front of me breaks out the matches.

But first you've got to spot the terrorist. Look around: Do any of your fellow passengers look like they hate America? Are they acting suspicious or reading The New Yorker? There's been a lot of debate lately about profiling, and personally, I'm against it. Not because I think it's offensive, but because it plays right into the terrorists' hands. Sure, the terrorists have fit a certain description so far, but that may not always be the case. So, Jewish grandma, Asian toddler, white "airline pilot"—I'm watching you.

As soon as we start looking in people's underwear, they'll stop wearing it.

Situational awareness is important, too. Terrorists look for cover to execute their plans, and the airline bathroom is the perfect place. You should be extremely suspicious of anyone who goes to the bathroom on a plane. But how long should you wait to take action? Einstein posited that time isn't linear, and a perfect example occurs when you're waiting to use an airplane bathroom. Time passes much faster inside an airplane bathroom than it does immediately outside the door. So if someone seems to be taking too long in the can, look at your watch and give them five minutes. Inside the bathroom, this will equate to 30 seconds. Anything more than that, and the Bathroom Bomber (as he shall henceforth be known) is definitely up to terrorist stuff. Kick in the door and beat him senseless. If necessary, ask the flight attendants to help. They've got those heavy coffee carafes.

Training average passengers to fight (and fight dirty) is crucial, but we should bolster our defenses even further. We've been lucky that the last two foiled attempts have been perpetrated by geek dorkwads who are too spastic to light a fuse. Again, that won't always be the case. Which is why I think we need to gird our safety net with a new national program that I call Ultimate Fighters Fly Free. How far do you think a terrorist is going to get with Kimbo Slice sitting next to him? Additionally, we need to keep our nation's badasses on our side, and letting them fly free is a great start. Because what if Steven Seagal, lawman, decided to switch allegiances? Right now, we're lucky he chooses to use his powers for good.

Like the Transportation Security Administration itself, we're going to make mistakes. I was on a flight recently where I thought the passenger next to me said he loves the Taliban's version of Shariah. Turns out he actually said he loves "Man! I Feel Like a Woman!" by Shania (Twain). So he probably didn't deserve to be zip-tied to his armrests and waterboarded with a Diet Sprite. But you can't be too careful. Look how Newark Airport was shut down by one guy walking past security. In the era of the Underwear Bomber, everyone has a short fuse. ✖✖✖

The Collins Card { CHRIS COLLINS }

WELK'S WORTH

He's the heart and soul of the Patriots.

IN ANOTHER YEAR (one in which we expected the New England Patriots to be champions), this might've been the most talked-about decision since owner Robert Kraft wooed Bill Belichick away from the New York Jets. The decision was the one Belichick made during the final week of the NFL season. The Patriots had practically clinched the third spot in the conference. They knew they would be playing the Baltimore Ravens at Gillette Stadium. So their game against the Texans meant little more than a refresher, a chance to work out the kinks.

Meanwhile, the Indianapolis Colts had a similar dilemma, only theirs had an asterisk. They were 14-0. So the Colts decided to play their second- and third-stringers. Of course, they lost.

Belichick, ever the contrarian, decided to "play to win the game," as we've heard ex-Jets coach Herm Edwards say in one of the great coach's rants of all time. Less than six minutes into the game, we understood why the Colts did what they did. Wes Welker was on the field, holding his knee in a way that didn't look good. And after watching one replay, we realized that Welker's season was over.

Now, I love Wes Welker. Tom Brady and Randy Moss might be the most talented Patriots, but for two seasons, the team's most valuable player has been Welker. His injury was a twist of chance. He made a cut he's made about 250,000 times in the course of his life, moving his feet as automatically as a hamster does in a wheel.

This time it didn't work. When Welker left the game, so did the heart and soul of the Patriots. And so did the prospects of a successful Patriots postseason, as we learned painfully a week later.

A few days after the accident, on a chilly night in downtown Boston, I met with Welker. Despite being on crutches, he kept his word to make an appearance at Radius at an event hosted by Liberty Bank. It was Welker's first interview since the injury, and, remembering how he'd been reduced to tears on the sidelines, I was ready to console him.

No need. Welker was remarkably upbeat.

"Have you run through that play in your mind over and over again?" I asked him.

"I'm done beating myself over it," he said. "There's nothing I could have done. It just happened." But, like everyone else, Welker was perturbed about the playoff loss against the Baltimore Ravens, which he'd watched from the owner's booth at Gillette, which has a view near the 50-yard line on the home side of the field. "That was embarrassing," he said. "That was not us." But when I questioned Welker about the Patriots' leadership, he snapped that there was enough leadership to get the job done.

Welker's season in 2009 was the stuff from which legends are made. For the third straight year, he tallied more than 100 receptions, including a league best 123, despite missing nearly three full games. That's not good; that's great. (So whenever we rail against Belichick's drafts during the last five years, most of which have been below average, we ought to remember that Welker was a measly second-round pick.)

Now the bullets are flying as fans and media assign blame for the frustrating season. Brady wasn't Brady. Moss disappeared when he was needed most. The Patriots defense couldn't pressure the opposing teams' quarterbacks. Jerod Mayo looked nothing like the guy we were promised on draft day in 2008. In other words, problems with the team were much deeper than any knock to Welker's knee. But lest we forget, the Patriots, with all of their warts, managed 10 wins and a division title, and Welker was the most consistent performer on the team.

Welker concluded our chat by saying that there was no timetable for his return. Rehabilitation was going to be hard, especially considering he's never gone through it before. Will he play five games next year? Ten games? Or will he miss the entire season altogether?

Those are scary thoughts. ✖✖✖

3 Valentine's Day Love Letters

Claude, Baby... How did it come to this? Where did we go wrong? Everything was perfect; we were all so happy. And now this? Come on! You aren't still mad that we made fun of your Winter Classic hat, are you? Let's get back to being us, 'kay? Kisses, the Media.

Beloved Big Baby... I've made a huge mistake. I thought I was bored with you. I thought I needed more. Most of all, I was really, really looking for some attention. But now I realize the error of my ways. We are one, and we will be forever. XOXO, Uno Uno.

Dearest Weekend Lunch Lady From Sex Rehab... Hey, it's Tiger. I need you to do me a huge favor. Can you please, uh, take your name off your phone? My sponsor went through my cell and may be calling you. You have to do this for me. Huge. Quickly. Bye.

4 DATES TO WATCH

2/7 It's Rivalry Sunday as the Celtics host Orlando and the Bruins head up to Montreal. There's also some football game going on in Miami, but no one cares much about that anyway.

2/8 It's been 17 years since a team other than BC or BU has won the Beanpot Tournament. Tonight at the Garden, it becomes 18 years.

2/12 Vancouver plays host to the Winter Olympics, or as I like to call them: "My quad-annual love affair with curling."

2 TOUGH DECISIONS

Who's Better: Brady or Manning? Listen, I'd rather go blind than ever see Brady in another NFL uniform. But right now, gun to my head and forced to choose one QB to lead my team, Manning has to get the nod. (That felt awful. If you need me, I'll be in the shower.)

Who's the Ace: Lester, Beckett or Lackey? I go back and forth on who I think will emerge as the ace of this staff. But ultimately, I keep falling back on Beckett. He'll be inspired by Lackey's presence, super-motivated by impending free agency and, come late-September, will yet again be the guy we all want with the ball.

5 OVER/UNDER BETS

LEAP OF FAITH Rondo the All-Star

Rajon Rondo Career All-Star Appearances: Over/Under 5.5
Making it for the first time is huge. Also huge? In 2020 Rondo will be younger than Ray Allen is right now. But the biggest question with 'Jon has to be longevity. How long can a guy with his build continue to take such a beating? Especially when his minutes are only going to increase moving forward. You know, this stings like acid on a paper cut, but I have to take the under.

Bruins Playoff Seed: Over/Under 8
At press, the Bruins are one point back from a playoff spot, and the question is: Do you see it getting any better? I do, but, unfortunately, not until next season. The B's have been hit with the perfect storm of BS and bad luck since jump street, and four months later look on the verge of collapse... even if it's only temporary.

Celtics Playoff Seed: Over/Under 2.5
Cleveland looks poised to run away with the No. 1 seed, leaving the C's, Hawks and Magic to duke it out for No. 2. Ultimately, January was Orlando and Atlanta's best chance to take control as the Celtics were a disaster. But those other guys missed the boat, and now Boston's moving on—getting stronger and healthier every day. They'll have home court in the second round, although it's unclear if that's still an advantage.

25-Home-Run Hitters in 2010: Over/Under 1.5
It's been 18 years since the Sox finished a season without at least one 25-home-run hitter, and while this year's team offers some decent candidates, there's no sure bet. Youk's done it twice, but barely; 25 would match VMart's career high. Ortiz? Beltre? Drew?!? I guess I'll take the over, but I won't feel good about it.

Second-Half Games for Kevin Garnett: Over/Under 25
The Celtics have 32 games left after the break, and I don't think Garnett plays in more than 24 of them. And that's fine. In fact, I'd prefer if he didn't. At this point, it's obvious that he needs some rest going forward, so why get wildly frustrated when they give it to him? They can survive without KG in March (but talk to me in May).

1 ONE TAKE FIVE ENDORSEMENT

He's got five Super Bowl rings and knows what it'll take to win a sixth. He's been with Belichick since 2000, so he understands the Patriot Way. He's a former All-Pro who's earned the respect of every man in that locker room. He's Pepper Johnson, and he deserves the defensive coordinator job.

Soroff On SARAH BRADFORD

The actress/model opens up about Gossip Girl and skin cream, but not so much about her famous stepbrother.

UP-AND-COMING ACTRESS SARAH BRADFORD, 22, is both a model and a muse. She attended the Pike School in Andover and the Loomis Chaffee School in Connecticut before making her runway debut during New York's fashion week, modeling for designer Alvin Valley. Bradford caught the attention of Levi Okunov, who used her in his Fall 2009 runway shows, and she has worked the catwalk in Sean Connery's "Dressed to Kilt" show and Project Runway contestant Ra'mon-Lawrence's spring 2010 show. She has also modeled designs by Carolina Herrera on Today. As an actress, she has three films due out this year: Mountain Park, When the Devil Comes and The Adjustment Bureau (starring her stepbrother Matt Damon). She lives in Manhattan.

Jonathan Soroff: So how sick are you of being identified as Matt Damon's stepsister?
Sarah Bradford: I suppose it's a compliment, given what a talented actor he is, but I'm very much my own person, and I don't need that defining my identity.

Do you think it helps get your foot in the door?
Is this whole interview going to be about Matt? I'd actually prefer to talk about something else.

Deal. What's the worst part of modeling?
I love the fashion world. Modeling was my way of being connected to that world, but also assuming a character and acting. When you're modeling, you're not just posing or standing there. You're inhabiting a character, and I don't think people give models enough credit for that.

Do acting and modeling have a lot in common?
Yes. We're actually working on a project now. It's called "The New York Story." Each different model is going to be the epitome of a different neighborhood: uptown, downtown, East, West. I'm going to be the downtown girl, so I'm going to completely inhabit the role.

Most fun thing about being a model?
The energy. Being part of a creative process. The team collaboration. I even like the hierarchy of it. Everyone has their role, from the designer to models to stylists to makeup artists.

You've been dubbed one of New York's "It" girls. How does that feel?
I didn't even know that, actually. My entire life, I've been a social person. So to be quite honest, that's news to me, and it's not something I sought out. It's tricky. There's a fine line between being an It-girl and a party girl, and I would never want to be seen as a party girl.

What's the real story between you and Chace Crawford?
[Laughs.] No comment. Sorry.

OK, but if you were on Gossip Girl, which character would you be?
None of them!

Oh, c'mon.
OK, Dorota, the maid. She's one of my favorite characters, and the fact that when it started, she was sort of a nonentity [but] was so good that now they've really developed her character... I kind of love that.

Funniest thing you've ever read about yourself?
Oh my gosh. That I was trying to use my Oscar-winning stepbrother's fame to get a role, or something like that. Being referred to as a "model-turned-actress," which is ridiculous. I'm a model, but I've been an actress since before I ever modeled, studying it and pursuing it since high school.

Are you better in comedy or serious drama?
Comedy is fun, and I hope to have the opportunity to do that, but I'm more drawn to serious topics.

Fantasy love-scene partner?
Johnny Depp.

Biggest lie on your acting résumé?
I totally don't have one. That's such a huge mistake. This is such a small world, you can't afford to lie. If you do, you're setting yourself up for total embarrassment.

Do you watch Project Runway religiously?
I don't. I've seen lots of episodes, and I like the show, but it's hard to find time to watch anything regularly.

Biggest beauty secret?
Actually, I just bought it. REN Rose Synergy 012 Restoring Facial Serum. You put it on at night, and when you wake up your skin is glowing.

Is beauty in the eye of the beholder?
Yes, and to be totally cliché, it comes from within. Beauty isn't surface. It has to do with personality and who someone is.

Would you ever move to L.A. for your career?
I would for a proscribed amount of time to work on a project. And then I'd come back to New York. Essentially, I'd love to be bicoastal, and if my career called for it, of course, I'd do whatever I needed to.

But you'll always be an East Coast person at heart?
Yes. Absolutely.

Ever Google yourself?
No, actually.

Well, most of what comes up is an author with the same name.
That's reassuring. Although I wish it said, "Critically acclaimed actress..."

Tip for looking good in a photo?
I think it's what you're thinking, to be quite honest with you. If you're happy, and you're thinking good things and full of energy, excited and enthusiastic about what's going on, that comes through in your eyes.

Does being a good actor mean being a good liar?
No. Acting isn't lying. You're presenting a character, so it's a form of truth. In my own life, I'm the worst liar, and it's something I choose not to do. It's bad karma, and anyone can tell if I'm lying. But I hope I'm a good actor.

Would you ever do a nude scene?
If it was artistically done for an unbelievable part, and I trusted the director and really felt that it was integral to the story, I would consider it. It would have to be tasteful and for the proper role.

Fill in this blank: Sarah Bradford is quite sure that _____.
She's an actress/model and not the other way around. [Laughs.] ✖✖✖

TWENTY BACHELORS AND BACHELORETTES HIT THE AMES.

SINGLES SCENE

BY JONATHAN SOROFF © PHOTOGRAPHS BY JÖRG MEYER

WE CAN'T ALL SPEND A SUMMER AT THE JERSEY SHORE.

Which means looking for love the old-fashioned way. Online. But if that doesn't work, there's always The Improper's annual bachelor/ette issue. Every year, we poll our readers for the city's most eligible singles, and every year, we're inundated with nominations. Next, we gather in the conference room, hunker down with food and only then does the serious sifting begin. It's a meeting you don't want to witness (trust us), and while we admit to adding a few names of our own, most come from you. Undoubtedly, part of the reason our 20 picks aren't free agents is that they lead full lives, but they also have something else in common: They're comfortable in their own skins. On that note (standard stalker disclaimer), we'd like to point out that just because they've agreed to appear in this issue doesn't mean they necessarily want to hear from you. So, here they are, the members of THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN'S BACHELORS AND BACHELORETTES, CLASS OF 2010.

HEATHER GORDON

ACTRESS

You may have seen Gordon looking gorgeous in The Donkey Show. A Californi[a] she's currently comple[tes] final semester in the [MFA] program at the Ame[rican] tory Theater/Mosc[ow] School Institute for [Advanced] Theater Training a[t] University. A veteran [of] critically lauded stage p[ro]tions, she appears in her f[irst] feature film role in the soon-to-be-released Seducing Charlie Baker. A fitness fanatic, she runs 4–6 miles every day and exercises in the gym, while her childhood surrounded by the redwoods of Marin County gave her a love of hiking. A huge baseball fan, Gordon was a season-ticket holder to the San Francisco Giants for many years, but she'd rather be on the field playing. She also loves volleyball, skiing, skating and biking. For a year, Gordon toured with Kaiser Permanente's Educational Theatre Program, teaching kids about health issues, and she's been a fundraiser for Hospice. A top-eight finalist in the Miss California pageant in 2008, she won the Robin Williams Scholarship at College of Marin. Gordon's destined for stardom, and we can't wait to see what she does next.

WILLIAM RONDO

28, TRANSPORTATION COMPANY OWNER

Besides always having a sweet ride, he's a sweetheart of a guy with a flawless bullshit detector (which comes in handy when dealing with people who might just want to know you because your brother is a certain Celtics player). Born and raised in Louisville, KY, Rondo attended Murray State University, and is now the president and CEO of Superior Global Transportation. Their motto: Providing stellar chauffeuring, whether that means a Town Car in the Back Bay or a Mercedes in Hong Kong. An athlete in his own right, he played high school, college and semi-pro football. He's no slouch on the basketball court, golf course or baseball field, either. A natural gamesman, he likes to bowl, play cards and pool, and he's sat through movies you've never heard of. Not coincidentally, one of his passions is editing film, while his other interests include singing (in the shower) and traveling. As a volunteer, Rondo mentors young adults, and he's active with the Massachusetts Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. A member of the East Boston Chamber of Commerce, he's all over town, but always smiling, always the life of the party.

JODY COHEN

28, COSMETICS CEO

Don't let the unfailingly sunny disposition fool you. She's one smart cookie—and tough to boot. After earning a BA at the University of Miami, Cohen worked in corporate retail and as a makeup artist when she recognized a glaring hole in the market: a product that provided the pigment of a lipstick with the shine of a gloss. That was the inspiration for Cosmoholic, the company she started almost two years ago after collaborating with a group of scientists to develop a "liquid lipstick." It's now available at specialty boutiques in most states (24 stores in Massachusetts alone), as well as Canada and Kuwait. In her downtime, Cohen's a big movie buff, and a real sucker for horror flicks. A native of Swampscott, she's extremely close to her family and gives back to charity. Spunky and spontaneous, she's like a hot sorority girl crossed with a Fortune 500 CEO, which she just might be someday.

PATRICIA DE LA ROSA

36, SPANISH TEACHER

De la Rosa's a Spanish Spanish teacher, hailing from Barcelona. Fluent in five languages, she got her master's degree in English at the University of Barcelona (there's a Cole Porter lyric in there somewhere). De la Rosa now teaches at the Boston Arts Academy and feels proud to work in an environment where academics and the arts are valued equally, as she's highly creative herself. Checked off her can-do list: flamenco and ballroom dancing, painting and cooking a variety of ethnic cuisines. A major plus for many guys: She plays golf. A major plus for many other guys: She likes sci-fi and horror films. She's also into kickboxing, practicing Hatha yoga, meditation, running and hiking. A bit of an adrenaline junkie, she enjoys skydiving and has traveled widely. A bit of a do-gooder, she's been sponsoring an Indian family through a humanitarian organization for four years. Charming, oddball tidbit: She has a pet fish named Cousteau. Forget Vicky and Christina. This is the Barcelona girl for you.

ALIM ADATIA

28, ASSISTANT DISTRICT ATTORNEY

How's this for a childhood? Born in Mississauga, Ontario, and raised in Houston, Texas, and Kinshasa, Democratic Republic of Congo, it's not surprising that Adatia's an interesting and well-rounded gentleman. He studied at the University of Western Ontario as well as in the Netherlands and Belgium, before earning his J.D. at New England School of Law. Now working as a Suffolk County prosecutor, assigned to Roxbury, off the clock he's a big-time traveler and foodie, while squash and racquetball keep him fit. Cool fact no. 1: His cousin, DJ Pup Dawg, spins on Jam'n 94.5. Cool fact no. 2: He worked for the U.N.'s International Criminal Tribunal as a member of the defense bar. He actively supports the Life Institute for Girls in India and serves on the board of Advocates for the African Child. A true citizen of the world, all you really need to know about him is that underneath his laid-back exterior, there's a guy who's rare and fascinating.

LORNA LOWE

37, FILMMAKER AND LAWYER

Born and raised in and around Boston, Lowe went to Noble and Greenough. She earned her BA at Howard, studied Cantonese and poli-sci at the Chinese University of Hong Kong, got her law degree from the University of Southern California and did a stint at the Sorbonne. As a documentarian and child-welfare lawyer, she's spent the last eight years producing films [illegible] social issues, and [illegible] ing kids and parents in abu[illegible] neglect cases. Currently in post-production on a movie called Return, about a man trying to [illegible] the world. Being the mother of a five-[illegible] year-old girl in the kind of shape that turns heads. Her charitable involvement includes Room to Grow, and despite her seemingly heavy load, she still manages to be spontaneous. One example: Last month, Lowe had a craving for coffee from her favorite shop in Salem several hours later, she pulled into Penn Station. She certainly does [illegible] lived [illegible], but any man would be lucky to have her.

CHRISTINA KAELBERER

27, PASTRY CHEF

A woman who makes sinfully delicious desserts all day: What's not to love? A native of [illegible], Kaelberer was raised in the Minneapolis area and began her culinary studies at the Art Institutes International in Minnesota before training with professional chocolatiers at Vail Resorts's Lodge at Grand Chocolat in the Rhône Valley. She now serves as the executive pastry chef at [illegible] spot Market in the W Hotel. A sports fan, she loves knitting, visiting museums, and going to concerts and the theater. Kaelberer also enjoys trying new restaurants, and one of her idiosyncratic hobbies is sampling cupcakes across the nation. She's involved with Share Our Strength, has a cat named Fatty, and has received professional awards and accolades. A total sweetheart, Kaelberer's as scrumptious as the treats she whips up.

JOHN KOSS
29, LAWYER

Our gay bachelor has the kind of rangy good-looks of a 1940s leading man. Born in Akron, Ohio, and raised in Tucson, Ariz., Koss earned a BA in Hispanic Studies at Northwestern, followed by a master's at the prestigious Medill School of Journalism, and then a law degree (cum laude, no less) from BU. By our reckoning, that means he should be chief legal correspondent for Telemundo, but instead, he's an attorney at a white-glove firm. An impetuous and intrepid traveler, his last great trip was 48 hours in Brussels spent eating mussels. When he's not planning international itineraries on the back of cocktail napkins, Koss teaches a legal-research and writing seminar. He's a member of the American Liver Foundation's Run for Research marathon team, and serves on the boards of the Massachusetts Lesbian and Gay Bar Association and Fenway Community Health. He's successful, witty and adventurous, not to mention taller than your average homosexual.

BRETT QUEENER
25, PROFESSIONAL LACROSSE PLAYER

Remember lusting after the lacrosse players in high school and college? Well, they only get better with age. Proof positive: this native of Penn Yan, N.Y. Lacrosse is in his blood: his father, brother and sister are all coaches. At the University of Albany, Queener was a three-time All-America East Conference Player and led the team to the 2007 NCAA Men's Championship tournament. He now plays goalie for the Toronto Nationals in Major League Lacrosse and forward for the Boston Blazers in the National Lacrosse League. When he's not on the field, the sport he follows most closely is college football. A Phish and reggae fan, Queener loves going to concerts and anything to do with the outdoors. As he puts it, "I live with a lot of flair and take a lot of chances." Named Inside Lacrosse magazine's 2008 Lacrosse Personality of the Year, he's actively involved with the American Heart Association and Susan G. Komen for the Cure. He: lacrosse player. You: lucky if you turn out to be Jane.

CHRISTIAN BAILEY
34, VENTURE CAPITALIST

A latter-day James Bond, Bailey has the accent to prove it. Born in London and raised in Godalming, England, he has a BA and an MA from Oxford, and did a fellowship at MIT. A general partner at incTank Ventures on the brainier side of the river, he sources new investments in applied-science companies. An aviation buff with a helicopter named Halo, Bailey's currently recruiting a management team to launch a charter company. He sails, shoots, considers critical thinking a hobby and throws a mean dinner party. If you're not already exhausted, there's the kite surfing, skiing and running, museum memberships and piano lessons he just started taking. On the lovably dorky end of the spectrum, he volunteers in K-12 classrooms and belongs to the MIT German Sailing Club. On the international-man-of-mystery side of things: Bailey spent two years in the Middle East "working for the U.S. government," and still keeps an apartment in Beirut. He speaks English, German, French and Arabic, and his main form of transportation, even in winter, is a bicycle. "But," he points out, "I do pick up my dates in a car."

KELLY DAVIDSON

32, PHOTOGRAPHER

A Connecticut native with a degree in photojournalism from BU, our gay bachelorette is peerless with a camera. (Full disclosure: We love running her work in The Improper). Nothing short of a music nut, Davidson plays bass in the band Naked on Rollerskates. To stay in shape, she does yoga, runs and bikes, often to raise money for MS. A creative dynamo, she makes short films and is at work on two major projects: a cookbook called Edible Rock (with Eric Schmider of the group the One Smith) and part four of the series Rock 'n' Roll Parents, which features musicians like Kay Hanley, Dennis Brennan and Jen Trynin with their kids. She has a rescue dog named Sasha and a cat named Memphis, a wall's worth of professional awards, and one cool, can-do attitude.

LEILA AMERLING

27, PROGRAM COORDINATOR

Born in Florida and raised in the Philippines, Amerling went to the International School of Manila, earned her BA here at Emmanuel and an MBA at a university in Koblenz, Germany. She now handles operations and finance for a research group at Children's Hospital that's developing a program to deliver real-time online information about emerging diseases. When Amerling's not saving the world, she's still saving the world: She sponsors a little girl in the Philippines and is helping her own mom rebuild a school there that was washed away by the recent floods. She also works with D.R.E.A.M. (Dominican Republic Education and Mentoring) and donates to the Red Cross. On the lighter side, Amerling likes cooking, baking, crafting, photography, dancing and travel (she needs extra pages added to her passport). In short, her life is one big adventure.

TUUKKA RASK

22, PROFESSIONAL HOCKEY PLAYER

Rask hails from Finland, where he attended college. Drafted in 2005 by the Toronto Maple Leafs but traded to the Bruins, he recorded his first NHL victory in 2007 when he helped them beat (ironically enough) the Maple Leafs. Last January, Rask was called up from the minors and shut out the New York Rangers, 1-0, proving his mettle. This season, he's put together a winning record and impressive goals against average while splitting time with fellow goaltender Tim Thomas. Outside the rink, he enjoys playing the drums, tennis and soccer. His charitable involvement includes visiting sick children at local hospitals, and his idea of a good time is a night out with the boys. A true team player with a sexy Finnish accent, he's a catch-and-a-half. Oh, and for the record: It's pronounced Too-ka.

ERIN HAWKSWORTH

28, TV REPORTER

A real-life Lois Lane, Hawksworth's originally from Canada but mostly grew up in Sammamish, Wash. After attending Arizona State, she studied journalism at American University and now works as a general assignment reporter at Fox 25. In her downtime, Hawksworth likes to bake, cook, read, tweet, text and write, which is a major passion. She's run several 10Ks for charity and plans to get involved with one that targets cancer because her grandfather recently lost a battle with the disease. Guys will love the fact that she's a sports freak and even worked as a sports reporter in Dallas. And while they might not love the fact that in the middle of Red Sox Nation, Hawksworth roots for the Cardinals, deserves special dispensation. Her brother, Blake, is a pitcher for the St. Louis Cardinal's AAA affiliate (the Memphis Redbirds). The Girl Next Door meets Nancy Drew, she's resourceful, smart and stunning.

WILTON L. VIRGO

31, PROFESSOR

How many people do you know who hold an endowed chair at age 31? And how many of those are guaranteed to make the hearts of the student body (at least the heterosexual part) go pitter-pat? A New York native, Virgo went to Princeton, got a PhD at Arizona State, became the first black postdoctoral fellow in chemistry at MIT and now teaches in the chemistry department at Wellesley. He's also an MIT research affiliate. Brainy enough for you? Well, the rest of the package is there, too: He's into salsa dancing, hiking, weight-lifting, and plays classical and jazz trumpet. Outside, he loves sailing, mountain biking, snowboarding and tennis. Indoor sport? Squash. The member of too many professional societies and recipient of too many awards to list here, he volunteers his time consulting for a school district on tutoring, and his academic meanderings (as well as natural wanderlust) have taken him all over the world. One last thing: He's an excellent cook.

ALISON BARNARD

31, BOUTIQUE OWNER

A tomboy who blossomed into a fashionista butterfly, Barnard's from Boxford, went to the University of Richmond and then Babson for her MBA. While there, she wrote the business plan for in-jean-ious, her first successful shop in the North End, followed by Twilight, home to the perfect party dress. Barnard sometimes feels she missed her true calling as a rock star, which results in some fairly flamboyant karaoke, and she's always the first person on the dance floor. Named one of Inc. magazine's "Top 30 Under 30" in 2008, most recently she earned the thumbs up from Stacy London of TLC's What Not to Wear. Passionate about female causes, she's planning an event this spring to benefit Women for Women. She's a rare combination of kid sister, go-getter, hipster and hottie.

GREG CASEY

39, POLITICAL ADVISOR

There must be something in the water at Catholic Memorial School in West Roxbury—Casey (a Needham native) went there with pop star Joey McIntyre, filmmaker Dave McLaughlin and two city councilors. A graduate of Roger Williams University, he planned on becoming a journalist, but after interning for Ted Kennedy, he went to work for Mitt Romney. Now, Casey is a top advisor to the man taking Kennedy's place, newly elected U.S. Senator Scott Brown. Off the clock, he loves to hike, bike, kayak—pretty much anything to do with the outdoors. He's actively involved with fundraising for the Big Sister Association, Boy Scouts of America, Best Buddies, Heading Home and various veterans' causes. Unfortunately for local gals, he'll soon be one of Washington's most eligible bachelors. There's always long-distance dating.

PAUL LANGONE

33, SPECIAL OFFICER

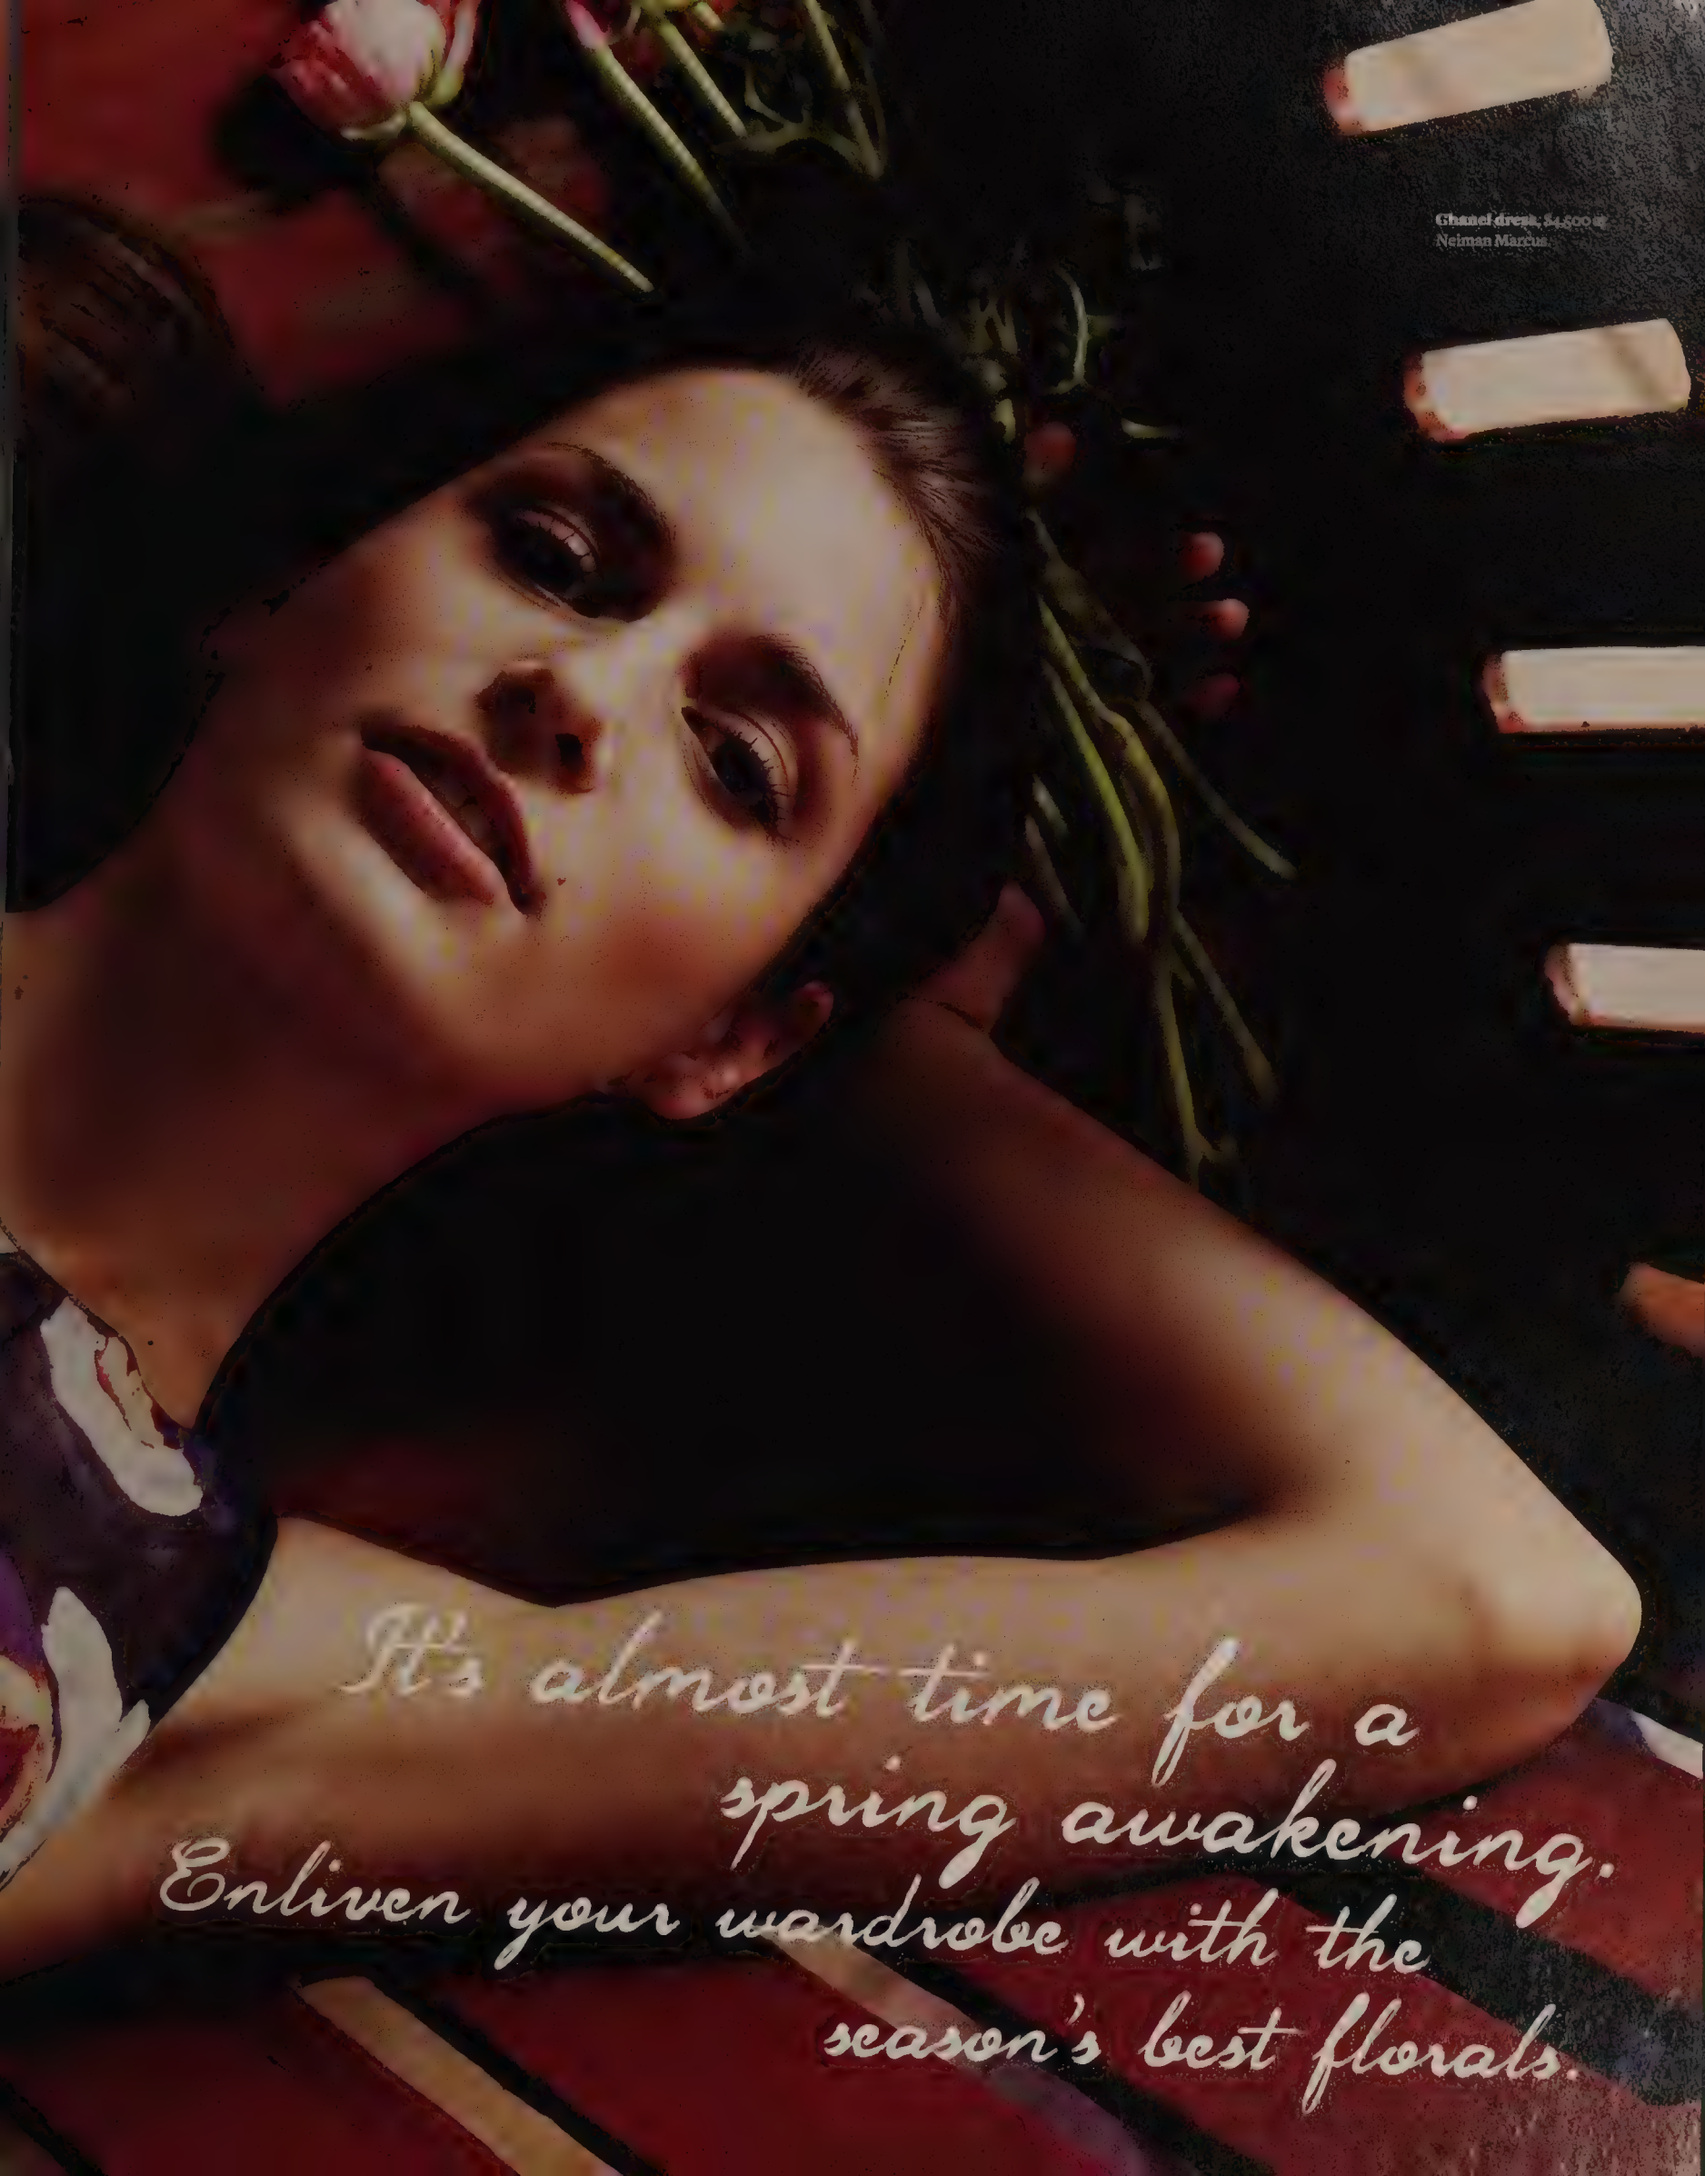
Langone is the good guy kids look up to. He lives in Reading (still surrounded by family, as befitting a nice Italian boy) and serves as special officer for the City of Boston. Which means that Langone gets assigned to places that require 24-hour patrol—in other words, places that can be dangerous—and he's had to make some difficult choices under difficult circumstances (just Google him). But what really makes him the kind of guy we'd let date our sister is the fact that he refuses the label of hero. In 1998, Langone won the Golden Gloves, although he says going to the gym is as much about clarity of mind as physical strength. He has a rescue dog from Tennessee named (what else?) Champ. A fundamentally decent guy, any girl would be lucky to have him there to protect and serve.

KENNEDY ELSEY

38, RADIO PERSONALITY

As half of Mix 104.1's morning drive-time duo Karson & Kennedy, this redheaded dynamo has become one of Boston's most beloved on-air personalities since moving here from Memphis. Originally from Virginia, Kennedy studied theater and psychology at Drake University. A voracious reader and aspiring foodie, she recently got a motorcycle license. A natural ham, Kennedy served as the DJ for one night in The Donkey Show, and she says, "If there's karaoke, I'll sing it. If there's a band, I'll be onstage by the last set." Still getting acquainted with the Bay State, her charitable involvement includes BARCC, the Shade Foundation and Best Buddies. The owner of two cats who dislike her intensely, Kennedy will never give up her Sunday paper or her library card. As fiery as her hair, she's more fun than a barrel of monkeys.

COLIN LEWIS



26, CHEF AND MUSICIAN

A guy who zigs at the same time as he zags, Lewis is a rock-star chef. Among the balls he currently has in the air: playing in the band Parker House and Theory, working as sous chef at River Gods, and serving as the originator and executive chef of the culinary experiment known as the Washburn Underground Kitchen, a gypsy restaurant that he operates in Brookline. His education is similarly idiosyncratic: Lewis studied film at Emerson and biotech at URI. As a member of the IATSE Local 481, he's run sound, lights and stage setup for concerts at Fenway Park and Gillette Stadium. He has a cat named Priest, but prefers dogs. And he has a huge heart, raising $40,000 for the Elias Fund (which provides scholarships to kids in Zimbabwe), organizing cancer benefits at several universities and using his cooking skills to feed the homeless at least once a week. A maniacal mensch, he's the ultimate iconoclast.

WHAT A DRAG

SOMEHOW, SEEING fishnets, nipple tassels and whips in tasteful black-and-white photography doesn't elicit the same blushes as seeing them at arm's reach, under garish stage lighting with a pumping soundtrack in the background. Henry Horenstein's new exhibit, Show, features simple images of the raucous world of drag queens and burlesque dancers. The elegant photos will be on display at Walker Contemporary in the South End until Feb. 27, with an opening reception on Feb. 5 from 6–8 pm.

ERIN WIEGERT

Show is at Walker Contemporary, 450 Harrison Ave., Boston (617-695-0211) through Feb. 27. walkercontemporary.com.

Avatar ★ ½ Twelve years and some $400 million later, James Cameron's latest opus lands with a thud. Sure, you can admire the 3-D presentation, performance-capture technique and computer animation. (If you're not already impressed enough, characters keep elbowing you in the ribs, a reminder that you're watching something amazing.) This is groundbreaking, next-level technology, and I was bored out of my damn mind. Looking like a tacky airbrush painting, Avatar is CGI eye candy by way of prog-rock album covers with an absence of characterization and an abundance of corny dialogue. Unabashedly ripping off Terrence Malick's The New World, Kevin Costner's Dances With Wolves and his own Aliens, Cameron sends Sam Worthington's crippled space marine to a distant planet to reenact a banal white-guy-saves-the-natives fantasy. It feels recycled, rehashed and more like an F/X demo reel than an actual movie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Blind Side ★ The inspirational true story of the Baltimore Ravens' Michael Oher becomes one of the year's most inadvertently offensive movies, thanks to Sandra Bullock's rampaging ego and the kind of unconscious racism Hollywood does better than anyone else. Oher, the troubled son of a crack addict, spent much of his childhood homeless before being adopted by a rich, white family who kindly helped him fulfill his potential. But instead of focusing on Oher's moving struggle, The Blind Side spends two hours inviting us to worship the selflessness of his new mom, played by Bullock as an amalgamation of Julia Roberts' least appealing qualities. She fires off sassy one-liners in endless glamour shots, while the rest of the cast nods approvingly and tells us how great she is. Oher, played by Quinton Aaron, is given no thoughts of his own. He just thanks her profusely and does what he's told. This isn't a movie about adopting a son; it's about adopting a pet. (At Boston Common, and in the suburbs.)

The Book of Eli ★ ½ Essentially The Road for Dummies, directors Allen and Albert Hughes' postapocalyptic slog stars Denzel Washington as a taciturn, almost supernaturally gifted protector of the last remaining copy of the King James Bible. Hacking and slashing off limbs to spread the word of God (which I think may be missing the point), Washington keeps The Good Book from falling into the hands of nasty folk like Gary Oldman's scenery-chewing whorehouse owner. Oldman's predictably hambone performance nods to Ian McShane's immortal work in Deadwood, and it's fascinating how much the Hughes Brothers slave to replicate sequences from other movies without coming up with an original idea of their own. There's more than a little Mad Max, with certain scenes stolen outright from Children of Men. As if the constant visual references to Sergio Leone's spaghetti Westerns weren't enough, one of the characters can't stop whistling Ennio Morricone music cues. There's nothing here you haven't seen done before, and done better. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Crazy Heart ★★ ½ In his best performance since The Big Lebowski, Jeff Bridges stars as a washed-up, alcoholic country singer touring lousy Southwestern dive bars. Scott Cooper's debut feature initially boasts a grungy authenticity, but just when you think Crazy Heart is on its way to being The Wrestler of country music, a banal redemption formula kicks in and sends the whole film reeling off into inspirational TV-movie land. The too-young Maggie Gyllenhaal proves an improbable love interest for Bridges' seedy troubadour, and (an excellent) Colin Farrell drops by as a former protégé who makes success look far too easy. The grim, admirable desolation of the film's early passages is quickly abandoned for garden-variety uplift and clichéd rehab scenes. The late-game addition of Robert Duvall as a curmudgeonly AA aficionado only adds to the phoniness. These brave performances deserved better. (At Boston Common and Kendall Square.)

An Education ★★ ½ In what's sure to be Roman Polanski's favorite film of the year, dazzling newcomer Carey Mulligan stars as a 16-year-old schoolgirl who falls under the sway of Peter Sarsgaard's suave 30-something hepcat in gloomy, postwar Britain. Adapted by novelist Nick Hornby from Lynn Barber's memoir, the movie takes a tender look back at statutory rape as a rite of passage, and it's a testament to

How to end humanity on the cheap

Legion ★ ½
Starring Paul Bettany, Lucas Black, Tyrese Gibson, Adrianne Palicki, Charles Dutton and Dennis Quaid. Written by Peter Schink and Scott Stewart. Directed by Scott Stewart.

Bold Films LP

STOP ME IF YOU'VE HEARD this one. A blowsy, otherwise unexceptional blonde is pregnant with the future savior of humanity. Evil forces are trying to keep the child from being born. Lucky for her, a rogue hero transports to our dimension—arriving naked in a Los Angeles alley—stocks up on stolen clothes, fails miserably at social interactions, and attempts to protect the ungrateful mother-to-be and her super-fetus from the nefarious architects of Armageddon.

Sounds a lot like The Terminator, but actually it's Legion, the latest and lamest entry in cinema's recent glut of apocalyptic drama. (If a movie opens in direct competition with The Book of Eli, yet somehow distinguishes itself as an even bigger plagiaristic collection of spare cinematic parts, well, that's just sinful.)

Perhaps pundits can come up with reasons why the end of the world has become so trendy lately, but honestly I'm sick to death of it. Especially when done on the cheap, as in Legion.

The only twist on The Terminator formula is that instead of angry robots, we're dealing with a vengeful God, who's had his fill of humanity and wants to wipe the slate clean. But instead of following through on any of the Revelations, or even bothering to smite us with plagues, God sends an army of angels downstairs to possess humans and turn them into foul-mouthed zombies with silly plastic teeth.

For reasons that are never quite explained, Adrianne Palicki's trailer-trash waitress is eight months pregnant with the savior of mankind. Working at the riotously named Paradise Falls Diner, conveniently located in the middle of the desert, she's attracted the interest of both Lucas Black's stammering good ol' boy and the archangel Michael (Paul Bettany).

Moved by her plight, Michael falls from grace and saws his wings off—a grisly bit of home surgery shown in excruciating close-up. After loading up on machine guns, the badass angel holes up in the diner and shoots zombie-angels in the head with a demographically diverse collection of patrons straight out of central casting.

Oh, what a wacky bunch we have in this diner! There's a rich guy, a black guy and Dennis Quaid! And in Legion, the revolution isn't even televised; folks listen to it on the radio. All while Michael kills a procession of zombie-angels, makes dour pronouncements and arbitrarily decides that the sanest course of action would be to wait in the diner for an entire month until the baby is born.

Even after seeing the movie, I have no idea who this child is supposed to be or what he might do to end the Biblical cataclysm. Were I Palicki, and had been informed that my impending progeny was humankind's last hope, I'd try to cut back on the cigarettes a little.

Legion is a cheap siege flick gussied up with inconsistent theology. The good moments (there are two) involve the demonic/angelic possession of an elderly lady and a seven-year-old boy. In other words, the movie only begins to entertain when a super-powered hag is screaming the c-word and biting people's necks, and a little kid is attempting a home-abortion with a kitchen knife. The rest of the film could've been patched together from clips of the crappy '80s movies in your VHS collection.

Every archetype (I refuse to call them characters) at the diner has such boringly traditional redemption arcs, the only surprise arrives when director Scott Stewart visualizes heaven. As Bettany's Michael and Kevin Durand's Gabriel have a late-movie argument in flashback, Stewart shoots them in close-up and shines blinding light directly into the lens.

No wonder Michael fell to Earth; he probably just wanted sunglasses. ✖✖✖ some fine performances that the film only feels icky in retrospect. There's nobody better than Hornby at dissecting all the ways people like to define themselves through their tastes and fascinations, but in nearly every other respect, his screenplay is too fussy and neat for its own good. This is a very polite, middlebrow view of what must've actually been an extremely messy affair. Director Lone Scherfig keeps everything humming pleasantly along, with even the inevitable betrayals and recriminations occurring at a genteel pitch. It's as if all the characters are afraid to raise their voices. The feel-good final reel is almost unforgivable. (At Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Extraordinary Measures ★★ What happened to Harrison Ford? Once the biggest movie star in the world, carrying both the Star Wars and Indiana Jones series with his roguish charm, he's somehow aged into a growling, miserable old crank with a keen eye for crap. It's shocking to see this formerly towering icon playing second fiddle to Brendan Fraser in such a shoddy, disease-of-the-week TV movie. The first venture from CBS Films betrays its small screen origins, as it's full of flat lighting and pedestrian medium shots. The perpetually weepy Fraser stars as a sad dad of two kids stricken by a rare muscle disease. He hustles to fund an experimental enzyme-replacement treatment, pioneered by Ford's prickly, distinctly unlikable scientist. Ford's bristling jerkiness is this predictable picture's lone asset. After wallowing in manipulative close-ups of children in wheelchairs, the artist formerly known as Han Solo barks, bellows, blasts classic rock in his laboratory and does nothing whatsoever to ingratiate himself to the audience. He's much meaner and more interesting than the material. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Fantastic Mr. Fox ★★★ ½ Writer/director Wes Anderson's fastidious, sometimes suffocating, attention to costume detail and production design make his movies feel like they're taking place in dollhouses, so it makes sense that he would work with puppets. Rendered in hand-crafted, stop-motion animation, this marvelous adaptation of the Roald Dahl story may look like one of those Rankin-Bass holiday specials from the 1970s, but it still feels like a Wes Anderson film. It's got the filmmaker's dysfunctional family pathos and droll hipster humor, only with woodland animals instead of actors. George Clooney voices the title character, a reformed chicken-thief turned newspaper columnist itching to return to his criminal roots. His antics stoke the ire of three nasty farmers, and Mr. Fox and family find themselves on the run. Boasting bone-dry vocal turns from Meryl Streep, Jason Schwartzman and Bill Murray, the movie feels like a summation of Anderson's career thus far, with certain scenes lifted almost directly from The Royal Tenenbaums and The Life Aquatic With Steve Zissou. (In the suburbs.)

The Imaginarium of Dr. Parnassus ★★ Terry Gilliam can't catch a break. The 2002 documentary Lost in La Mancha chronicles The Man Who Killed Don Quixote, Gilliam's aborted project that fell victim to natural disasters, catastrophic health problems and general bad planning. Just when things were starting to look up, Gilliam took on The Imaginarium of Dr. Parnassus. First, star Heath Ledger passed away, then producer William Vince succumbed to cancer. During post-production, the director was hit by a car and broke his back. I wish I could report a triumph over impossible odds, but this film is an unholy mess. Christopher Plummer stars as an immortal, old-time street performer lugging a stage set across modern-day London, while gambling with the devil (Tom Waits) over how many souls he can save. Ledger turns up as a con man, with Johnny Depp, Colin Farrell and Jude Law filling his shoes every now and again. It's a stumbling, patchy movie that's interesting at moments but confounding in the end. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Invictus ★★★ For such a straightforward, often clumsy crowd-pleaser, Clint Eastwood's latest still feels like a marvel of restraint. Indeed, Invictus is an exercise in doing less with more. Recently elected Nelson Mandela (Morgan Freeman) seeks to reconcile a deeply divided South Africa by rallying the public behind their largely white rugby team, which had long been considered a symbol of institutionalized racism. Like Eastwood's Flags of Our Fathers, Invictus is about how cynical, insincere political calculations are often necessary to serve the greater good. Eastwood's not great at shooting sports, but he gets a sly, complicated performance out of Freeman, and there's some predictably fine, understated work from Matt Damon as the team captain. This should've been the hokiest movie ever made, but Eastwood plays it quietly and close to the vest. (At Boston Common, and in the suburbs.)

It's Complicated ★★★ There's such a lightness to Meryl Streep's work these days—even in something as wretched as Mamma Mia!—that she seems to be having the time of her life. Same goes for Alec Baldwin, whose middle-aged paunch has unleashed his inner comedian. Writer/director Nancy Meyers honestly doesn't have to do much besides put these dynamos together and let them riff. Playing a couple that's been divorced for a decade, Streep and Baldwin drunkenly hook up the night before their son's college graduation and spend the rest of the movie negotiating the horny aftershocks. Baldwin's remarried to a bitchy younger woman (Lake Bell, harshly photographed to give Streep the advantage) while Meryl finds herself in a tentative courtship with Steve Martin's sensitive architect. Like most Meyers movies, this one wallows uncomfortably in ostentatious displays of wealth. But there's no denying the giddy chemistry between Streep and Baldwin. They're both having so much fun it's contagious. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Lovely Bones ★ ½ Peter Jackson, New Zealand's splatter-movie hero turned tedious golden boy, took on Alice Sebold's beloved novel and conceived the kind of film that only somebody convinced of their own genius could create. The Lovely Bones isn't just a lousy picture; it's bad on a legendary scale. The story of a child's rape and murder shouldn't produce such peals of laughter, but Jackson's gaudy representations of the afterlife, mawkish sentimentality and all-around tastelessness borders on camp. After young Susie (Saoirse Ronan) falls victim to Stanley Tucci's twitchy neighborhood pervert, the movie splays out in a hundred confounding directions, including a tacky CGI heaven full of New Age hokum. While the criminally miscast Mark Wahlberg wallows in grief over his daughter's murder, Susan Sarandon drops by for bad comic relief as the drunken grandma. Jackson keeps the emotional pitch of every scene cranked to 11, crushing the delicacy of Sebold's tale beneath elaborate trick-shots and juvenile, hyperbolic hysteria. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Nine ★ Rob Marshall is back with a desultory take on Federico Fellini's 8 ½, and it's a travesty. Much like Marshall's pitifully unimaginative adaptation of Chicago, Nine is a musical for people who hate musicals, again confining the singing and dancing numbers to a black soundstage that exists only in the imagination—because God forbid anybody burst into song in a musical. Fellini's playfully sad reverie has been adapted by Michael Tolkin and the late Anthony Minghella, two desperately serious screenwriters who make the fatal mistake of treating a comic predicament as the stuff of grand tragedy. Daniel Day-Lewis might be our greatest living actor, but he couldn't possibly be more wrong for this role, replacing Marcello Mastroianni's debauched delight with angst, hand-wringing and temper tantrums. He also seems about as Italian as a shepherd's pie. (At Stuart Street Playhouse and in the suburbs.)

The Road ★★ If you've read Cormac McCarthy's Pulitzer-Prize–winning novel, you're probably wondering how it could possibly lend itself to a satisfying adaptation. The relentlessly grim tale of a man and his young son wandering through a post-apocalyptic wasteland, McCarthy's book is a collection of unsettling anecdotes lacking the kind of forward momentum that movies require. Rendered faithfully here by director John Hillcoat, The Road is a miserable slog through an ashen, ruined landscape, punctuated by random attacks from redneck cannibals. Viggo Mortensen stars as the father, appearing emaciated and ill, reciting chunks of the novel's prose in voiceover. Charlize Theron appears briefly in flashback as the mother, fleshing out a couple scenes McCarthy only suggested. Hillcoat supplies images of magnificent desolation, but it's still a hopeless dirge with no variation in tone. A guy and his kid pushing a shopping cart toward certain doom worked on the page, but the film leaves an audience with no point of entry. One note played well is still only one note. (In the suburbs.)

A Serious Man ★★★★ Grappling with mysteries on a deceptively mundane stage, the latest gem from Joel and Ethan Coen is about the silence of God. Set in a Minneapolis suburb circa 1967, the film stars Michael Stuhlbarg as a college physics professor and human doormat whose entire life begins to crumble one day with the kind of one-thing-after-another momentum that the Coens typically apply to their crime pictures. It's The Book of Job according to a couple of wisenheimer skeptics. Larry's search for celestial explanation leads him up the hierarchy of local rabbis in a series of agonizingly funny and fruitless counseling sessions and rambling parables. As usual, the Coens are being dismissed in some circles as snickering, nihilistic yuksters. But such a reading willfully ignores A Serious Man's deliberately open-ended, questioning structure. In the end, do any of us really have any choice but to accept the mystery? (In the suburbs.)

Sherlock Holmes ★★★ ½ Folks who grew up on the tweedy elegance of Basil Rathbone's 1940s B-movies might quibble with director Guy Ritchie's presentation of Sherlock Holmes (Robert Downey Jr.) as a loutish, bare-knuckle-brawling, manic-depressive. However, I found the film to be the most pleasant surprise I've had at the theater since Star Trek. It's a jaunty, very funny picture. So often in action movies brainpower is synonymous with weakness, but the script presents intelligence as just another form of bad-assery, with Holmes using his encyclopedic knowledge of human anatomy to overcome foes twice his size. Downey and Jude Law's Watson have the easy, bristling chemistry of an old married couple, and Sherlock's only problems arrive when the screenplay keeps them apart. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Twilight Saga: New Moon ★ And you thought the first one was terrible? This second installment of Stephenie Meyer's awful ode to sexual repression is so glum, dreary and snail-paced, it feels like it plays in slow-motion. Pining, as always, for sparkly vampire Edward Cullen (Robert Pattinson, still looking vaguely embarrassed to be here), Kristen Stewart's depressed Bella pouts, whines and stares off into space a lot. With Edward out of the picture for most of the running time, she tries to distract herself with the happy, shirtless visage of Taylor Lautner's Jacob. But Bella has rotten luck with boys, as every guy who takes a shine to her seems to end up being some sort of supernatural beast. Though his waxed chest might lead you to believe otherwise, Jacob is actually a werewolf, and so we suffer through more of Meyer's lame mythology and lots of annoying emo posturing. It takes an awfully long time for nothing to happen in New Moon. (In the suburbs.)

Up in the Air ★★★ ½ Director Jason Reitman's sturdy, crowd-pleasing adaptation of Walter Kirn's novel is best when it allows George Clooney to subtly toy with and deconstruct his tabloid persona. Clooney stars as a blissfully single corporate tool who spends 300 days a year flying from town to town, firing folks whenever their cowardly bosses need to outsource the axing. Streamlined, efficient and preaching a gospel of "no luggage," Clooney meets his match in Vera Farmiga's randy road warrior and finds himself forced to rethink his philosophy when Anna Kendrick's up-and-coming protégée threatens his way of life. It's slick, classy entertainment, more beholden to Billy Wilder than Judd Apatow. Reitman's occasional bouts of glibness are no match for Clooney's seemingly effortless, soul-searching work. The handsome bastard is able to suggest sudden, midlife bouts of yearning without making a big show of it. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The White Ribbon ★★★ Michael Haneke, the harsh, professorial director behind Funny Games and Caché, loves to punish his audience. His latest, which won the Palme D'Or at last year's Cannes Film Festival, is no exception. Filmed in high-contrast black-and-white with Haneke's usual air of viciousness and lack of music, The White Ribbon tells the sad, elliptical tale of a small pre-WWI German town infected with casual sadism. There's something reminiscent of Village of the Damned in Haneke's presentation of the town's children, tormented by their vicious, dictatorial parents until animal abuse and casual acts of torture are practically inevitable. Like his other films, there's a dazzling command of formal cinematic technique in the service of a one-note thesis. Haneke's attempting to depict Nazism in prepubescent form. The White Ribbon is a bit too easy and pleased with itself but still impossible to shake. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

Youth in Revolt ★★ Michael Cera's gawky, stammering virgin routine proved hilarious in Superbad and earned him incalculable goodwill on Arrested Development. Yet he seems stuck in first gear, delivering identical performances in every project since. Based on the novel by CD Payne, Miguel Arteta's latest is a bumbling mess, but at least it allows Cera to add a few shadings on his patented persona. Cera starts as Nick Twisp, mopey son to a slatternly mother (Jean Smart) who endures countless humiliations from her trashy boyfriends. One summer, Nick flips head over heels for Sheeni Saunders (fetching newcomer Portia Doubleday). In a desperate attempt to woo the sophisticated, promiscuous Sheeni, Nick invents an alternate persona named François Dillinger, a mouthy arsonist with a yen for cigarettes and vehicular mayhem. It's as this rowdy alter ego that Cera finally breaks out, using voluminous profanity and an acerbic attitude that's hilarious when emanating from his wispy frame and baby-face. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

TABLE FOR EIGHT (866-822-5348 OR WWW.TABLEFOREIGHT.COM) IS A SOCIAL INTRODUCTION SERVICE

Table for Eight replicates the way people used to meet by bringing people physically together to dine. Indeed, many members of this 20-year-old service are disillusioned on-line daters who are tired of the cat-and-clicking-mouse games of such contacts and their frequent deceptions. Table for Eight people span in age from late-20s to late-40s, with a smattering of baby boomers. Typical members have been busy cultivating their professional lives with an income averaging $73,000, perhaps figuratively married to their career but now considering the corporeal variation: 85 percent haven't been married yet and are childless.

The actual table—located at a restaurant like Sibling Rivalry, Cucci Cucci or Le Mistral—must be round, no harsh, excluding edges. This serendipity of strangers brought together has been compared to the gemütlich flavor of wedding reception dinners. You can dine with such scintillating types as physicians, lawyers, psychologists and teachers and scientists from local prestigious universities. An initial phone interview involving 60 questions screens members and identifies interests, views and preferences.

Although friendship and networking are benefits of dining with new people, Table for Eight also boasts at least 60 engagements, that they know of, that have resulted from their restaurant get-togethers in the last five years.

DOUBLE VISION

Tegan and Sara broaden their sound and image with symbiotic pop sense.

Tegan and Sara play the Orpheum Theatre Feb. 13.

Pamela Littky

OVER THEIR 11-YEAR career, Tegan and Sara Quin have learned to transcend superficial labels. Today, with major-label exposure for their last two CDs, the Canadian twin sisters have secured both a devoted and expanded following that recognizes the duo for its smart, evolving blend of folk, punk and synth-pop. "We realized early on that [our image] was sort of out of our control, that people were going to take the facts and spin them the way they wanted," says Sara Quin, 29. "There's an instinct to think, 'That's wrong.'

Just 'cause we're gay or just 'cause we're twins doesn't mean we're 'girl music' or 'gay music.'"

Quin credits the Internet for helping to paint a more authentic image. For starters, Tegan (pronounced TEA-gan) and Sara's own Web site includes up-to-date blog postings (hockey remains a favorite interest, snowshoeing is new) and creative videos.

"We were putting ourselves through our own filter and that has allowed our audience to connect to us more directly," she says. "As our career grew and the scope of what we've done accumulates and grows, it becomes so dense that it's much easier to accept that what people see, and take away, is more comprehensive."

Their latest record, Sainthood, exposes the duo's most catchy elements, from the New Wave–ish synth burps and percolations of Sara's songs to Tegan's pop-punk stylings. They worked again with Death Cab for Cutie's Chris Walla, who both produced and joined Tegan and Sara's band on bass, keyboards and guitar.

Walla sees the big picture, Quin says. "He's an extension of what Tegan and I do for each other: He's sort of an outsider's perspective," she says. "But one of the strongest things about Chris Walla is he really sees things as a whole. He sees albums as albums. The tempos, the keys the songs are in, and how they work sequentially with each other.

"I like to think we're a pop band," says Quinn, whose group plays Northampton's Calvin

"Just 'cause we're gay or just 'cause we're twins doesn't mean we're 'girl music' or 'gay music.'"

Theatre on Feb. 12 and the Orpheum the next night. "I want every song to be sung along with. I want every song to resonate deeply, emotionally and lyrically."

Lyrically, the sisters dissect relationships. "There's certainly a universality to writing about anything—love is love, and heartbreak is heartbreak," Quin says. "We were going through different things when we were writing the songs. Tegan was in a relationship, and I wasn't. I was in a more reflective mood.... But there's a commonality."

Part of that commonality could be tied to their link as twins. "There's definitely a different energy, but it's so hard," Quin says from a Toronto tour stop. "In one song, I might feel completely connected to Tegan and the next song I want to take my guitar off and bum-rush her, like, 'What are you doing?!'"

As teenagers growing up in Calgary, the twins followed separate paths to shared pursuits, from making music to dating girls. As songwriters in the same band, the singers wrote independently—Sara the more methodical one, Tegan more impulsive—before swapping comments on each other's music. "It's sometimes nice that you're zoomed in, thinking about what you do," Quin says, "and that's when someone swoops in with a different kind of perspective and often just helps to improve the song."

The sisters caught the attention of Neil Young and his manager, Elliot Roberts, who signed the duo to their Vapor label in 2000. Quin says Roberts told them, "You want to be a career artist." She adds, "That spoke to me. It gave us permission to pace ourselves and set goals and change those goals."

Much has changed since, from sonic treatments to their fanbase, which skews younger than the bar crowds they faced at age 18. "I felt young and vulnerable and insecure, and looked at those people almost as wild animals," Quin says. These days, she adds, "I think of myself as someone who can provide some comfort or inspiration, and sometimes it's just so people can hoot and holler and objectify us!" ✖✖✖

Precious Metal

Sound and Fury

Killswitch Engage have perfected the science of shredding on their latest, self-titled album, a mix of hardcore howls, dense drumbeats and screaming guitars. The Massachusetts band is known for its energy, its attitude, guitarist Adam Dutkiewicz's booty shorts and vocalist Howard Jones' vein-popping shrieks. Not to mention distorted (but catchy) guitar riffs. Hear them at House of Blues on Feb. 4. Tom Samph

Knowing Is Half the Battle

The Great Divide Think of your possessions: house, car, clothes, embarrassingly extensive collection of Madonna CDs. Now give half of them away. The Salwen family did just that. Prompted by their idealistic daughter, they sold their home, donated 50 percent to charity and began the journey that's detailed in The Power of Half. The father-daughter writing team of Kevin and Hannah Salwen share their story on Feb. 14 at Wellesley Booksmith and on Feb. 15 at Brookline Booksmith. They prove that we're not all living in a material world.

ATTENTION, BOUNTY HUNTERS! BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER DRESSED AS JEFF ZUCKER AT THE DEVIL'S CARNIVAL, FEB. 13–14 IN ORURA, BOLIVIA.

Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.

Immediately after having his picture taken on Argentina's Martillo Island, Matthew Fox was mobbed by penguins demanding a plot summary of "Lost."

Martha Mosco and Sarah Leibovici say cheese with columnist "Ezra Dyer" at the Boston Center for Adult Education. (The real Ezra is actually an infinite number of monkeys at an infinite number of typewriters.)

Keisha Whitaker was photographed with her husband, Forest, and her very own "Improper" cover. Now if we can get her to pose with this Sightings pic, we'll have ourselves an MC Escher picture.

DESIGNING WOMEN

Have It Your Way

Living well might be the best revenge, but it seems that dressing well is the best revenge against ovarian cancer. C.H.I.C.: Cure Her In Couture, a fashion show held at the swanky Ames to benefit Ovations for the Cure, featured designs by pint-sized dynamo Daniela Corte and hair and makeup by Grettacole.

Among the glamourpusses on-hand: fashionista Paula Jaq'lyn and her other half, George Brown, blonde bombshell Susan Haifleigh, ubiquitous hipster Ricardo Rodriguez, style maven Rosanna Ortiz Sinel, the über-fabulous Kathleen Golden McAndrew, marketing guru Joan Jolley, fiery Latina Josefina Bonilla and Boston Fashion Week founder Jay Calderin.

"My God," said one guest, blinking from all the camera flashes. "There are more people taking pictures here than at Tokyo Disneyland."

However blinding the glare of the photographers, it was the noise level that produced the evening's most comical exchange.

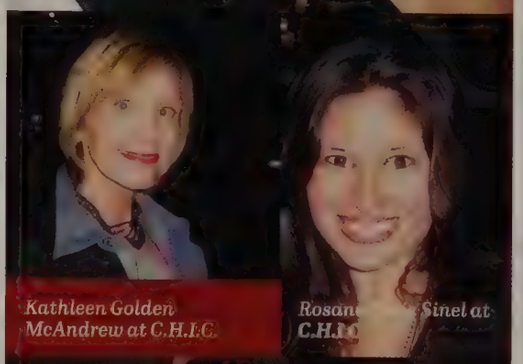
One man, upon being asked a question by a friend, looked completely puzzled and said, "Never!"

"Really?" she responded. "Why not?"

"Because I don't like Burger King!"

Laughing, the woman said, "What I asked you is, 'When are you going back to Burgundy?'"

Blessed Is the Fruit of the Vine



It's one of the few parties where it's perfectly acceptable to spit, and the usual group of winos—albeit well-dressed and generally well-behaved—turned out en masse at the Boston Harbor Hotel for the 21st anniversary Grand Opening Night Reception of the Boston Wine Festival.

Chef Daniel Bruce, the festival's founder, greeted guests at a Champagne VIP reception, which included: the inseparable Kelleys, Doyle and Tuthill, Chronicle cutie Amy Masters Ribner and her adoring husband, Josh, scenester extraordinaire Jim Sullivan and the ethereal Roza Yarchun, blonde do-gooder Lynn Dale and the dashing Frank Wisneski, PR czar George Regan, redheaded TV personality Mike Macklin, and so on and so forth.

It's saying something that I was on the wagon for the evening but still managed to have a good time, partially because the food that chef Bruce prepared was positively scrumptious, and partially because being sober at a wine festival affords one the opportunity to watch everyone else get tipsy and know that their heads will be pounding in the morning, as opposed to mine.

It also sparked some amusing exchanges, including the following:

"Did you know that so-and-so isn't drinking, either?"

"I know. She gave up caffeine, too."

"I'm staying the hell away from her."

Then there was the retired international businessman who said, "That used to be the Hobson's choice about traveling to Saudi Arabia. You could either fly British Air and drink but not smoke, or fly Saudi Air and smoke but not drink."

The Real Thing

Whether or not it happened that quickly for them, a whole pack of socialites (mostly the pre-facelift variety) turned out at the W for a reception hosted by the online fashion site Gilt Group for the publication of Bridie Clark's new novel, The Overnight Socialite.

Cohosted by such bold-faced names as Lisa Pierpont, Joanna Humphrey, Tonya Chen Mezrich and Erica Corsano, the event attracted the likes of glamazons Julie-Hume Gordon and Julia Owens, Her Serene Highness Doris Yaffe, PR princess Wendy Pierce and her sister, Jane Goldstein, fashionista Betty Riaz, beautiful blonde bookworm Leigh Weatherly Denny, hyperactive tractor heir Stephens Dunne and the stunning Molly, the superchic Evelyn Sobramanian and her other half, Sundar, fashion writer Christina Pierce and her man candy Ryan, Newbury Street scion Harley Bilzerian, pixieish stylist Marci Duarte, brunette heiresses Lauren Balsbaugh and Jessica Naddaff, real-estate babe Beth Dickerson, stunning blonde Kathy Burns and oodles of equally glittery others.

"It's like one big designer-handbag duel," observed one guest, while another rather cluelessly said, "I thought I was coming to a reading, not a cocktail party."

However, the most amusing exchange took place by the coat check, when one guest said to another, "We met once," to which the woman responded, "I'm sorry, I don't remember."

"I'm not surprised," he said. "I was on coke at your sister's wedding," to which she replied, "Oh. Me, too." ✖✖✖

ARTISTIC LICENSE

BALTIMORE HAS ONE. Pittsburgh does, too. Even Peoria's in on the act. Which is why the absence of an independent movie theater in Boston was a puzzle and an opportunity for David Bramante, co-owner of the West Newton Cinema. Last October Bramante converted the Stuart Street Playhouse into an art house worthy of the city's cultured populace. "The theater is just beautiful," he says of the 400-seat space. Bramante plans to screen first-run art films this year, but first he needs locals to take notice. "People have to break their routine and say, 'Hey, there's that other theater.'"

DINNER AND A MOVIE

In charmingly Cantabrigian fashion, the folks at Hungry Mother have both cooking and culture on the mind. Dine with them any night by 6 pm—try chef Barry Maiden's traditional potlikker—then catch a flick at nearby Kendall Square Cinema for $7 (a $3 savings). Call ahead to have the tickets waiting at your table. If the popcorn doesn't fill you up, swing back to the restaurant for its new late-night menu, home to spectacular ham biscuits. ELIZABETH BOMZE

What a Sucker

Beekeeper Joe Douillette joked to a few friends about starting a lollipop company called JP Sucks. Thankfully, his buddies (now his business partners) took him seriously. To get off the ground, Douillette mailed 10 pounds of JP Honey to an old-school candy shop in Wilton, N.H., and commissioned owner Doug Nelson to make the confection. These days the pops sell out fast. Which kinda sucks. ELIZABETH BOMZE

ALTERNATE FUNDING SOURCES FOR HOLLYWOOD EAST

One of the economy's victims appears to be Plymouth Rock Studios, whose ambitious plan to open a 240-acre production facility was put on hold when $550 million in financing fell through late last year. A few suggestions on how to get back in the game:

* Walk into the U.S. Treasury Department, say, "I'm Goldman Sachs CEO Lloyd Blankfein, and I'd like to make a withdrawal." Then help yourself.

* Get a second job mopping up Lady Gaga's eyeliner.

* Produce an MTV reality show called South Shore about the lives of six middle-aged, pasty suburbanites who do wacky stuff like sit in traffic on I-95 and shop at Williams-Sonoma.

* What do people want to buy? Snuggies. HDTVs. Market a 52-inch LCD screen that provides the neck-to-toe warmth of fleece.

* Open a Toyota dealership and hang up a sign reading, "Now with functional cars."

* Get rich the old-fashioned way: Steal land from American Indians.

* Invent a flushable iPad.

* Credit default swaps. Hey, it might work this time.

THERE ARE NO SMALL PLATES OR HOUSE-MADE CHARCUTERIE.

Going Out

Simple Pleasures

The Robinwood Cafe & Grille is a diner, though its name isn't ironic, like Cafeteria. There are no small plates or house-made charcuterie platters. It's the kind of place where today's special is souvlaki, you can get pizza by the slice, and the mailman likes to come in from the cold for some hot tea and a ham sandwich.

Sitting in the next booth is Angelo Gardias, with his shaggy gray moustache and eyeglasses hanging from a string. Gardias opened the Robinwood on Jan. 6 and runs the diner with his wife, Olympia. For years he ran a coffee shop in Long Island. Soft-spoken, Gardias fusses with a paper placemat as he explains, "Before I retired, I wanted to do something for myself. I wanted to do something that was successful." He adds, "In my life, I've done a lot of things. Now I know if I started it all over, I like this business."

A Greek émigré, Gardias toyed with the idea of calling his place the Ellis Cafe, but was afraid not enough people would understand the reference. Still, his customers now sit beneath photographs of old street scenes and people working in the land of opportunity. Gardias cooks them simple food, like pork chops ($12) or the Robinwood Burger ($8)—with no special sauce, just lettuce, tomato, onion and mayo. In classic fashion, breakfast starts at 6 am, and then goes all day.

"We're a small store, and we try to do the best we can, that's all," he explains. A table for six enters, and the waitress grabs a highchair for the baby. Gardias likes when customers need the highchair. Watching them order, he says, "I bring the family here, and that's what I like." NICK ALTSCHULLER

The Other Cab

Few people in this country know much about grape varieties in Portugal. To my mind, touriga nacional has the best shot at establishing its identity as an international star. The dark-purple grape has a thick skin, strong tannins and an uncanny resemblance in aroma and flavor to cabernet sauvignon. Used in high-end ports originating in the Douro Valley, touriga has been hard to find in pure form until fairly recently. In general, I still prefer drinking the grape in blends, which show more regional authenticity.

Quinta da Alorna Reserva Tejo, 2007 $18, 660 LIQUORS, CAMBRIDGE
A mix of touriga and cabernet sauvignon, this wine originates on the fertile plains watered by the Tejo River. It has complex floral notes, along with the somewhat raisiny, chewy flavor of sundried cherries. Textures are mellow and silky. It's a good, spicy, moderately intense wine suited for roast chicken.

Prazo de Roriz
Douro, 2007 $19, THE SPIRITED GOURMET, BELMONT
Despite port's fame, the Douro Valley actually produces greater quantities of table wine. This blend shows extra flesh and ripeness. Supple, velvety soft, with chocolate accents and dark-berry fruit flavors, it's a very sensual expression, with notes of raspberry and mocha in the finish. Enjoy with a rare tuna steak.

Carm Reserva
Douro, 2007 $19, 660 LIQUORS, CAMBRIDGE
The Douro's twisting, steeply sloped valleys are primed for world-class wines: warm, dry summers; rocky soils; lots of old-vine vineyards. Carm is dark, smoky and mouth-filling, with licorice, masses of black berries and a gamey terroir. Although fine now, it'll continue to age for at least 3–5 years.

MONEY WOES

TO THE PERSON WHO ASKED FOR MY HELP:
I owe you an apology. On a Monday morning I was sitting in South Station when you approached me, tears falling, telling me you weren't a bum, but you were short $14 for a train ticket, and you didn't know what to do. I told you I was sorry, but I really had no money to spare.... I thought about this after you left. So what if I gave you a buck? So what if you were trying to scam me? I began to realize that it didn't really matter. What matters are the decisions I make for myself and how [they] determine the pattern of my life.... The decision I made was wrong. So, let me say I'm sorry. Whether you're a scam artist or someone in trouble, I hope you find your own way.

Making-good Samaritan

To the motorist on Boylston:

I didn't get the opportunity to thank you for the traffic lesson. Unfortunately, I already knew I was jaywalking. Nevertheless, I didn't leap in front of your car or [do anything] beyond violating an oft-overlooked traffic law, but you still felt compelled to open your mouth. Well, some of us don't have a nice, warm Subaru to get around in this winter. So pardon me for being reluctant to stand on the corner and wait for the signal. Cold on the curb

To local patrons:

Yes, my job is to serve you coffee, but I'm a person, too! I have feelings and thoughts in my head other than perfecting your pretentious, nonsensical drink! When I tell you your total, please don't spill your change onto the counter and nod. Guess what? That upside-down triple-shot skinny caramel latte you so proudly sputtered through ordering just became a decaf whole-milk fat fest. Enjoy! Bothered barista

A DIFFERENT WORLD

Living with Asperger's syndrome

EIGHTEEN-YEAR-OLD Jacob, who has Asperger's syndrome, is fascinated by crime scenes, religiously watching Crime-Busters on TV at 4:30 sharp. Any deviation from the lockstep literalness that rules Jacob's life—and his brain—brings on meltdowns. When his tutor, Jess, is found dead, wrapped in Jacob's quilt, he becomes a suspect. He'd developed a fondness for Jess—and that's something not usually on the Asperger's menu. Jacob's mom Emma, abandoned by her husband, has raised her energy-consuming son with fierce devotion. Her other "normal" son, Theo, inevitably less focused on, develops a sideline of wandering dreamily into empty houses.

Author Jodi Picoult writes from different viewpoints, giving a wrenching, but also a very human picture of just what it's like to have Asperger's, or to be that kid's mother. Meals must have a specific color for each day of the week, like Green Monday. Emotions are things as rigid and objective as chairs. Metaphors and figures of speech? Huh? Jacob spouts movie lines, often inappropriately. But he's also smart, orderly and honest. Ironically, he needs to invoke the insanity defense in court; but though different, he's not insane. House Rules is rich with dialogue, vivid pictures of Asperger's and a little romance. ✖✖✖

House Rules
by Jodi Picoult

Picoult, who earned a master's at Harvard, lives in New Hampshire.

"It's not just sight and sound that are ratcheted up, either. My skin is so sensitive that I can tell you whether my shirt is cotton or polyester just by its temperature against my back. I have to cut all the labels out of my clothes so they don't rub because they feel like coarse sandpaper. If someone touches me when I'm not expecting it, I scream—not out of fear but because it sometimes feels like my nerve endings are on the outside rather than the inside."

Drink of the Moment

Light the Torch

While the cocktail-scene resurgence began with drinks from the pre-Prohibition era, the roots of the movement have now crawled over an unfortunate dry patch and found purchase in another fertile epoch. It's tiki time.

First popularized by Don the Beachcomber, a former bootlegger who opened a tropical-themed bar in Hollywood in the early 1930s, tiki drinks became known for big doses of rum and big flavors of fruit. "A lot of bars are making their own juices now," explains Scott Herrit, chef of Marliave, itself a former speakeasy. "That's what these kinds of drinks are all about."

Marliave's DONN BEACH ($10) is based on one of the Beachcomber's most famous creations, the Zombie—so named because if you have too many, you'll turn into one. Their version uses the tang from fresh orange, lime and grapefruit juice to tangle with a helping of Mt. Gay and a float of 151. Dashes of cinnamon simple syrup, bitters and Pernod round out the drink with a bit of earthiness and spice.

MARKET GLADNESS

Lionette's stays local.

HE'S ADMITTEDLY LESS of a purist than his predecessor, but devotees of Lionette's Market in the South End should be reassured by new co-owner Mike Otto's promise to buy "90 percent local for meat, produce and dairy." However, noting that previous owner James Lionette stocked imported Italian pasta and cheese, Otto says he will "expand and redefine the definition of local."

What does that mean? We'll see. The renamed Don Otto's Natural and Organic Market is still the only place in Boston to buy local, 100 percent grass-fed beef. Also unchanged is a commitment to working directly with nearly 200 small farms and area producers. Otto makes sandwiches with local (greenhouse) tomatoes he's ripened in the store window. But "right now," he says, "I have an avocado that's organic and from Georgia." There's your 10 percent.

SIX BURNER has replaced Firefly on Dartmouth Street. The same owners now focus on comfort food at modest prices: A burger with cheddar and bacon is seven dollars, and the most expensive item on the menu is the lobster mac 'n' cheese at a whopping $13.

AND FINALLY, a new restaurant is slated to open this summer in the Back Bay. It's called Deux Ave., "signifying the location at the corner of Comm. Ave. and Mass. Ave., across from Clio," executive chef/co-owner Chris Coombs explains. Coombs, executive chef at Dbar in Dorchester and now business partner of Dbar's owner Brian Piccini, says their upcoming project will be "affordable for the Back Bay... neighborhood-approachable and neighborhood-focused."

A MEAL IN PROVENCE

Bistro du Midi provides a tasty tour of the south of France.

NICE PRESENTATION Roast chicken arrives with a touch of theatricality, thanks to the open kitchen.

THE SOUTH OF FRANCE'S cuisine varies as one travels along the coast, but common ingredients include olive oil, garlic, tomatoes, thyme, basil and rosemary. Seafood dominates the region, but poultry, pork, lamb and even beef make appearances. Exemplifying the flavors of the region, Bistro du Midi touches all these bases.

Housed in the space formerly filled by the exceptional but too short-lived Excelsior, the bistro's handsome interior provides a worthy platform for the culinary performance. Banquettes and high-backed chairs offer comfortable seating under a beamed ceiling and wrought-iron chandeliers. A fireplace in the dining room banishes the winter chill.

My first choice was a no-brainer: the charcuterie platter ($12), containing slices of rich Serrano ham, robust Italian coppa, smoky German speck and saucisson sec from Lyons—the lowly pig triumphant in four languages. Delectable artichoke hearts ($6) emerged hot and crispy from the fryer, delicate as tempura. Crunchy pickled vegetables, including fennel and baby carrots, complemented the complex flavors of two thick slices of a country-pork terrine with pistachio ($10). Barbajans ($6), miniature parcels of tender pastry, came with three different fillings: lamb and tomato, goat cheese and honey, and pumpkin.

Our final appetizer, tender but resilient poached calamari ($14)—stuffed with spinach, chard and shallots with a lobster jus—provided a transition to the bistro's fish selections. Executive chef Robert Sisca's experience at starred seafood restaurant Le Bernardin became evident as I savored his roasted monkfish ($23). Served with a garnish of artichokes, shallots, thyme and capers, the distinctive texture reminded me why the fish is sometimes referred to as "mock lobster." One night, in Mediterranean mode, we added a pasta course between the appetizer and the main. The al dente chitarra ($18), long strands cut with a frame strung with guitar wire, served as an excellent vehicle for an assortment of shellfish flavored with saffron.

Enticed by the pasta's perfume, I vowed to make a return visit to partake of that herb in one of its best uses: bouillabaisse. The restaurant's "classic" presentation ($27) was a thing of beauty. Purists quibble that true bouillabaisse can be made only from fish native to the coast between Marseilles and Toulon. The evening I enjoyed it, the bouillabaisse consisted of striped bass, branzino and monkfish served in a shallow bowl with two small potatoes shaped like dirigibles. Onto this combination, the waiter poured hot, full-bodied fish stock infused with tomatoes and saffron. The traditional accompaniments—rouille (an emulsion of bouillabaisse, potatoes, Espelette peppers, garlic and salt), shredded Grûyère and thin toasts—completed the virtuoso performance.

Meat and poultry courses included roast chicken for two ($38), lamb chops ($29) and daube ($26). The chicken arrived with a touch of theatricality, facilitated by the open kitchen. We watched it being basted with olive oil, rosemary and thyme, and after being presented tableside, it was whisked back to the kitchen for carving and plating. Moist and tender, it delighted. The lamb chops, spiced with cumin, seemed skimpy for the price. The daube—beef braised with vegetables, garlic and olive oil—lacked assertive seasoning and tasted light on the traditional orange zest. The letdown was only temporary thanks to dessert: a first-rate fondant ($8) filled with molten dark chocolate and served with a scoop of caramel ice cream.

The wine list contains a good cross section of French options, including an old favorite, Mas de la Dame ($25). Fruity but well-balanced, this rosé complemented everything and was bargain-priced to boot. A substantial 2003 Domaine Houchart Côtes de Provence ($35) stood up to the red meats.

Bistro du Midi's hospitality paralleled the warmth from the fireplace. The young waitstaff proved pleasant and attentive. Their professionalism—and their French pronunciation—will improve with more seasoning, as will the daube, hopefully. But don't anyone mess with the bouillabaisse. ✖✖✖

VIRAL INFECTION

A YouTube hit generates a lot of hate.

A COUPLE YEARS AGO, I attempted to become a YouTube sensation with a parody of the song "Hey There Delilah." But the Tube wasn't impressed with my song, and a mere several thousand people watched it. However, fame often arrives by accident, and so it goes with YouTube and me. Just before Christmas, I made another video, and within a week it was viewed by more than half a million people. Which is certainly far fewer viewers than you'd get with a decent cute-baby video, but probably a bigger audience than the average episode of Last Call With Carson Daly. Since the video garnered a four-star rating, it seems that most of those viewers thought it was pretty good. But you wouldn't think so based on the comments—all 1,205 of them. Not all of which were mean. Just 1,200 of them were mean.

You may remember the snowstorm we got just before Christmas. It so happened that during that storm, I was testing an Audi R8 V10 for a car review. If you're not familiar with the R8 V10, it's a $167,000 wedge of sexiness with a Lamborghini motor. In other words, not a car you'd expect to see tooling around in the snow. However, the R8 has all-wheel drive—and this particular one had snow tires—so I decided to take it out and shoot a video. My mission: to buy dog antlers for my lab/basset hound mutt named Dino.

The New York Times posted the video on their YouTube site, and within a day or two there was plenty of constructive criticism. Like this: "You're a douche. The person taping you is a bigger douche. The dog with antlers is a douche by association." Or this: "You are the kinda people I just wanna punch in the throat." Then there was the guy who suggested I should be sodomized by a donkey on methamphetamines. Which honestly seemed a bit off-topic.

If I were to group the comments by theme, the most popular would be: "Why do you have that awesome car and such a crappy house?" The answer to that question—that the car wasn't mine, because I was testing it—was right there next to the video in the written summary.

But gleaning that information would've involved "reading," which evidently isn't a popular activity for the type of individual who takes the time to write—and I repeat verbatim—"waste ur time gettin grocieries and filming it, truly the appitamy of an audi owner, self conscious, self indulged." Sorry sir, but what I think you're trying to say is that I'm the epitome of self-indulged. I commend you for being vaguely cognizant of such a five-dollar word. If you give me your e-mail address, I'll sign you up for Merriam-Webster's Word of the Day to better inform ur future missives.

"That is fake snow. I was there, and I know."

Several other commenters joined the "time-wasting" refrain, posting the clever and original sentiment that they wanted their three minutes back. My sincere apologies for wasting the time of busy people who are sitting at their computers watching YouTube videos. Doubtless, my video was responsible for major productivity losses at the Large Hadron Collider, NASA and the MIT Media Lab. Hence, thought-provoking comments such as, "[Writing] inaugurates the destruction, not the demolition but the de-sedimentation, the deconstruction, of all the significations that have their source in that of the logos."

I'm sorry, did I say that was a quote about my YouTube video? That was a quote about deconstructionism from French philosopher Jacques Derrida. This is a quote about my YouTube video, again verbatim: "Your car is to low to the ground them roads didnt look to bad. I can drive almost anywhere i want i got a 4x4 truck. to munch money for a AUDI R8." Indeed, I didn't intend the video to prompt comparisons between the Audi R8 and a 4x4 truck, but as Derrida would point out, a text invites multiple interpretations, often confounding authorial intention.

There are loads more poisonous comments about my house, my face and my dog. And my faith in humanity would be a little diminished were it not for the handful of people who took the time to mock the judgmental, all-knowing horde. Like this one: "Instead of going for, your errand, you should've cut the grass. Look how tall it is. Your HOA will fine you. Anyone have pictures of Tyra Banks' feet?" I also appreciated, "That is fake snow. I was there, and I know." And my favorite: "Audis get better traction in the snow because they're made by leprechauns."

Those made me feel a little bit better. But there's really only one way to rebuild my self-esteem. A laughing baby with 100 million views is about to find out he sucks, and I want my two minutes back. ✖✖✖

EMPIRE STATE OF MIND

New York's superiority syndrome

I STILL THINK THAT ONE BAD day in Boston is like most days in New York. And despite the saying "If you can make it there, you'll make it anywhere," the Big Apple often seems like a giant hick town. Why? Because of the superiority syndrome which masks so much insecurity. This is true with the Upper East Side, especially; the high-end restaurants; the jockeying for table location; the tipping of doormen, maitre d's, concierges; the bribes to contractors, to service people. The fives, tens, twenties disappear into hands and pockets as if by magic. We don't have Siberia at any restaurant in Boston. There are no ego sections. Universally, we sit where seated. We don't count the presumed net worth of the people near us, sick that they might have more.

Here's my favorite story about insecurity: My wife and I came to New York to attend a college pre-25th reunion party. It was being hosted by a classmate, who owned a number of businesses and who appeared regularly in the press at charity and cultural events, holding his Champagne glass up to the camera. Clink. He generously wined and dined classmates at his Fifth Avenue apartment, loaded with modern art, even in the bathrooms. "Wow," I said to the host. "You have fabulous paintings, incredible sculpture." He looked at me in that New York way, not only wanting to impress, but to really impress. "You should see what's in storage," he said, thinking it would be the ice pick through my heart.

There's more to the insecurity syndrome. I have an old friend working in real estate in New York. Every time I talk to him he claims, "It's all over. Sell everything. It's all going to hell."

"Real estate?" I asked during a recent conversation. "Or everything?"

"The deficit, the clueless politicians, billions coming due in commercial real-estate loans that won't be rolled over. There are 38 states that are virtually broke in America."

"How are you and your business going to do?"

"My business is gonna be great," he responded. "We've got it all figured out."

There's another New York syndrome for you. It's not enough that you have success. Everyone else should fail, particularly your competitors and often various family members.

Dating New York women has provided me with additional ammunition. One New Year's Eve in college, I was fixed up with a senior at Vassar. I was told she came from Manhattan but spoke with a Russian accent. We went to a party at the apartment of a friend's parents, who were out of town. Fantasy lives, of course, especially with a Park Avenue pad, stocked bar, packed fridge, four bedrooms. The evening didn't start well. When asked what she drank, my date replied, "Scotch." The bar had no Scotch.

"We've got bourbon," the host said.

"Brands?" my date asked with her vague Russian accent, as if she'd arrived in a sleigh from Moscow with wolfhounds running alongside.

"Uh… Early Times?" my host said, reading the labels from the bar.

"I almost never drink bourbon," my date responded. "But when I do, it's only Jack Daniels." I could feel myself shriveling up. The evening disintegrated from there with the Vassar noblewoman seeming to sneer at me, the serf, until it was time to put her in a cab. After the taxi door slammed, she rolled down the window and said, "You could have kissed me." And the cab drove off. "If you can make it there, you can make it anywhere."

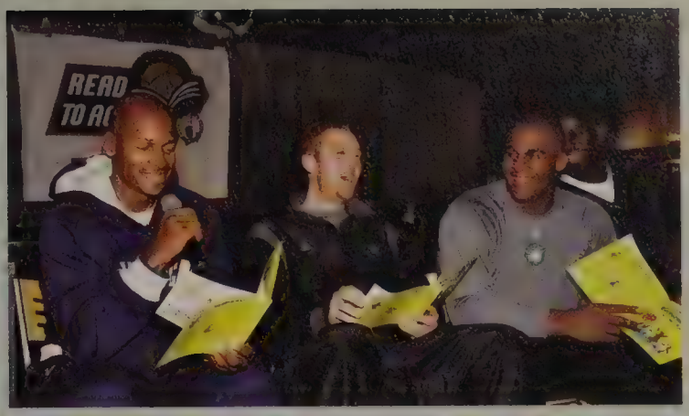
Just a few weeks ago, a Manhattan client took me to lunch at one of the city's classically pretentious restaurants, which was mostly empty. On our way out, a parade of women appeared, covered in furs and bling, air-kissing each other and flinging compliments as if the bubble days were here in spades and conspicuous consumption was back in style. "The ghosts of Christmas past lives," I said to my client.

"Denial," he replied. Each of the women looked like she'd had big work done—lips, eyes, noses, chins. It was a dreamlike sequence, as if Federico Fellini or Robert Altman were doing an Upper East Side peek at the decline and fall of a part of the American Empire.

I asked two members of the group, "What organization is this?"

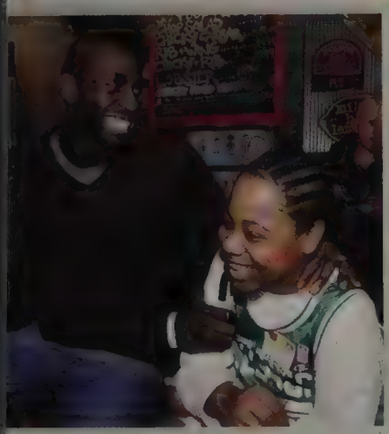
"No organization. It's a friend's birthday bash."

"I thought we were in a deep recession," I said, unable to resist.



The other woman said, "It's horrible. But if we dare admit it to each other, we're done for. No one will invite us anywhere."

So much responsibility for financial chaos belongs to this mentality. But rather than get into it, I'm going to end with a nostalgic twist on the theme. My father had a female cousin, a New Yorker who loved the era of the 1920s and 1930s, particularly the literature. When the cousin died, she instructed that her ashes be scattered in the fountain in front of the Plaza Hotel. Because, she explained, "That's where F. Scott Fitzgerald and Zelda cavorted drunk one night, dressed to the nines, dancing in the fountain." Her daughter carried out her mother's romantic wishes, dodging Christmas shoppers and cops. "The cold wind was howling," the daughter said. "I'm sure some ashes blew into F.A.O. Schwartz."



I repeat, "If you can make it there, you'll make it anywhere." After you pay all the taxes, and keep deluding yourself. ✖✖✖

The School of Sports { RICH LEVINE }

ON TA, TUUKKA, LEON AND LOWELL

5 QUESTIONS FOR THE SECOND HALF

Do You Trust in Tony?
OK, so it's the final seconds of Game 7, and the C's need a stop. Question #1: Which Celtic do you want defending the ball? Question #2: Would you believe my answer is Tony Allen? Yeah, I know, he still has his "Tony" moments on offense, but finally, TA's developed a defensive focus and mature intensity that will pay dividends in the spring.

Can They Actually Beat the Best?
They had four shots at Atlanta, and whiffed on all four. They had four chances to beat the Magic, and only did so once. With three games remaining against the red-hot Cavs, can you sit there on your crowded Green Line and argue that the C's will get it done? To quote the great 85: Child, please.

TA-DA! Tony Allen is finally maturing.

Might Marquis Make the Difference?
Yeah, he might. Forget that his return coincided with the two most frustrating losses of the Celtics season—that had nothing to do with Quis. His presence provides instant versatility and depth, and stabilizes a second unit that was gasping for air in his absence. Especially once Sheed stopped taking his meds.

What Exactly Is the Celtics' Problem?
Ask Doc and Danny, and they'll refer to the team's on/off mentality. They'll explain how the C's get a lead, relax and ultimately get screwed. But that's not good enough. We don't need to be told that the problem exists; we need to know WHY it exists. Finding the answer is the key to resolving these issues, and until then, the only time you'll see Gino is on the back of a milk carton.

What EXACTLY Is the Celtics' Problem?
My take is simple: They just think they're better than they are. "Oh, we've got a 12-point halftime lead against the Chris Paul–less Hornets? We're golden! The Hornets suck! Where we headed postgame?" No, the Hornets don't suck. As of right now, you do. And the sooner you realize it, the sooner this thing starts to turn around.

2 AWKWARD SPRING TRAINING CONVERSATIONS

Bridges Burned "Mikey Lowell! Nice to see you!" Um, really? "Oh, yeah! I know that we traded you this offseason, and tried to last offseason, and that I never really wanted you to begin with. But really, we're cool." For real? Thanks, Theo. I appreciate it. "Yeah, no problem... but seriously, I might not unpack quite yet."

Catcher's Interference "Hey, Tito! I'm back! Ready to go. Can I grab some reps?" Yeahhh, Tek, that sounds great. Listen, just let V-Mart go a little longer, and we'll get you in there, K? (An hour passes.) "What-taya-say, Skip?" Um, you know, I think Wake was just looking for someone to throw with. How's that sound?

1 ONE SAD STORY

With Peyton's latest playoff mess in the books, it's time to lament (again) over how sweet life would be had the Pats not choked away the 2006 AFC title. CliffsNotes: Brady wins a fourth, and is the undisputed "best ever." Manning wins nothing, and retires as Dan Marino 2.0. Blah!

3 Ripe Rumors

Spice It Up The Pats are in desperate need of a pass rusher, and once again, it appears Pro-Bowler Julius Peppers is theirs for the taking. As usual, the decision comes down to cash, but with an uncapped year on the horizon, it's time to break the bank. Sometimes you have to pay like a champion to play like one.

Ray's Day On Feb. 18, we'll finally learn Ray Allen's fate. Either way, the C's will be better. If Ray's sent packing, it's because Danny found the perfect deal, but if not, then, hey, maybe Ray can finally relax and play some ball? (At least until playoff time, when extension obsession kicks into high gear.)

Time for Tuukka Easier said than done, as they'd need to find a taker for that contract, and he'd have to waive his no-trade clause. But at this point, it's time to say goodbye to Tim Thomas. The 2010 Cup is a pipe dream, meaning priority No. 1 is preparing Tuukka Rask for when the games will matter most. Namely, 2011.

4 DATES TO WATCH

2/18 Revenge is on the Celtics' mind as they head to Staples for a date with the Lakers. Also on their mind? "Man, Khloe's kind of weird-looking in person."

2/18 Red Sox pitchers and catchers report to Fort Myers. Youk and Pedroia picture-text Beckett from the beach: "Haha. Sucker."

2/25: Yeah, yeah, LeBron's in town. But what about Leon Powe? His will be the loudest ovation the Garden gives all night (unless something awful happens to Anderson Varejao).

3/2 The Bruins return to work (against Montreal) after a two-week Olympic hiatus. It's the first time all season when you can't complain about how long it's been between goals.

"Almost all of my books at some point were optioned for film."

Soroff On JODI PICOULT

The novelist opens up about writing as a mom, movie adaptations and Cameron Diaz.

BESTSELLING AUTHOR JODI PICOULT, 42, has written 17 novels, including The Tenth Circle and My Sister's Keeper, which was made into a movie starring Cameron Diaz. Her newest book, House Rules, about a boy with Asperger's syndrome, hits stores in March. A Princeton graduate, Picoult worked as an ad-agency copywriter and an eighth-grade English teacher, among other jobs, before enrolling at Harvard to pursue a master's in education. While pregnant with her first child, she wrote her first novel. The recipient of numerous awards and accolades, she has been translated into 34 languages and is one of New England's most successful authors. She and her husband, Tim Van Leer, live in Hanover, N.H., with their three children and a virtual petting zoo.

Jonathan Soroff: So what's with the "i" in your name?

Jodi Picoult: Growing up, I hated my name, but I hear from a lot of readers who are Jodi's with an "i," and they pick up my books because of it.

Do you dot the "i" with a smiley face?
[Laughs.] No, a special big heart.

How did it feel to have My Sister's Keeper made into a movie?
Almost all of my books at some point were optioned for film, and you just kinda go, "Yeah, right." I will say that I was probably happier with the prospect going into it than I was at the end.

What would you have thought if you'd known Cameron Diaz would play the mother?
I would never have cast her. They had been tossing around names like Jodie Foster and Diane Lane and Julia Roberts—people with much more gravitas. I didn't think Cameron Diaz had it in her, but I will say that she did a really good job. I had no problem buying her as a mom. I had more trouble buying her as a lawyer, because she was just too nice.

Jason Patric: hottest thing ever?
Oh, my God! If I didn't have the world's hottest husband, I totally would've been all over Jason Patric. He was a really nice guy.

So you were on the set?
I was on the set... until I got booted off. The problem was that the ending was changed for the movie, and it wasn't a decision I was happy about. It went completely orthogonal to what I had requested and what the director told me would happen. I still don't understand why they made the decision they made.

Who do you think deserves an Oscar from it?
Either of the girls. Both Abby [Abigail Breslin] and Sofia [Vassilieva] were amazing. I watched them shoot one scene where Abby bursts into tears. They must have done six or seven takes, and each time they'd yell "Cut!" she'd wipe them away and be laughing and a totally normal little girl. She has mad skill as an actress.

Do you have any weird writing rituals?
I'm ritualistic in the sense that my children need to be in school in order for me to get anything done.

Favorite title of one of your books?
It's the one that's coming out in 2011, which is called Sing You Home. It's about embryo donation and gay rights, and one of the characters is a musician. Each of the chapters has a title that's a song that's on a CD that will be packaged with the book, and the songs were cowritten by me and a friend who sings them.

How has your writing changed?
If I want to describe something, I can probably do it in six words or less, instead of a whole paragraph.

What about life experiences?
I had so many more brain cells before I had kids. [Laughs.] If anyone ever teaches Jodi Picoult 101 at a college, you'll see a progression based upon where I was in my life. I started out writing about the relationship between a mother and a daughter, then I moved onto marriage and having children, and then all the scary things that can happen to a kid.

Worst job you ever had to pay the rent?
I worked at a two-person advertising agency, and I was one of them. My boss would go to work out in the middle of the day and leave his underwear on the floor and stuff like that.

Genre you're most comfortable writing?
I hate being assigned to a genre. It pisses me off. I hate being called a women's-fiction writer, because it's a real insult to the 49 percent of my fans who write me and are male.

Ever get writer's block?
No. And I'll tell you why. When I had a newborn, I learned very quickly how to write in the 10 minutes when your child is napping, or at nursery school, or not hitting his brother with a block. You just sat down and did it, because you didn't have great spaces of time.

List three adjectives that describe your books.
Controversial. Thought-provoking. Emotional.

Is there a word or phrase you use too much?
Whenever I think of a child's hand, I think of a starfish, and I always have to stop myself because I know I've used it before.

Can writing be taught or is it innate?
I think you're born a storyteller, but you can be taught to be a good writer.

One quality that unites all great writers?
Inquisitiveness. You have to want to know what happens next.

Top three books you'd take to prison?
Gone With the Wind, because it's really long and because it's the book that made me want to become a writer. An Alice Hoffman book, because she's my all-time favorite. I always say I'd read her grocery list. And then some piece of Russian literature, because I've never read any of it, and my oldest son, who's at Yale, is completely appalled by that.

Any plans to write a vampire series?
God! It's so funny you asked that! What I do in my spare time is write children's musicals with my son Jake and my friend Ellen. We raise money for charity, and next year's is about vampires!

Fill in the blank: Jodi Picoult would much rather____ than write.
I guess disappear to Turks and Caicos. But I'd probably end up writing there, too. ✖✖✖

DENNIS LEHANE'S NOVELS MAKE GREAT MOVIES.

BY THE BOOK

DENNIS LEHANE ENJOYS LIFE ON THE SUNNY SIDE THESE DAYS: a winter home in Florida, a new wife and baby, a dream job hosting the aptly named Writers in Paradise. Ivory towers don't come any brighter.

But in his work, this scrappy Dorchester boy has always favored the dark side—from the monstrous child rape and poisonous cover-up that leach into Mystic River, to the drugs and despair that radiate through Gone Baby Gone, to the madness and deceptions that frame the labyrinthine Shutter Island. Lehane's working-class heroes and villains are damaged goods in a fallen world of familiar street corners only a short cab ride from your favorite nightspot. Call it Boston noir. That happens to be the title of an anthology Lehane edited and contributed to last year. It's also the shadowy underworld he has mined into brooding bestsellers and hot Hollywood properties.

Consider: The big-budget movie based on his horror thriller, Shutter Island, will open to major fanfare this week. His latest book, The Given Day, is slated to be made into another big-budget film by director Sam Raimi of Spider-Man fame. And there's talk of a TV series based ✦ on Lehane's Gone Baby Gone Patrick Kenzie–Angie Gennaro detective duo, even as he wraps up the sixth installment of that popular series. (Producer Alan Ladd owns the rights to the characters, Lehane says, "so it's up to him.")

When Lehane shows up at this week's glittery New York premiere of Shutter Island, he'll reunite with Hollywood A-listers Martin Scorsese and Leonardo DiCaprio to showcase the third of his books that have spawned a major motion picture. Heady company for a former Ritz-Carlton chauffeur and car jockey. Nowadays, when the limos and red carpets roll, they roll for Dennis Lehane.

Yet celebrity doesn't seem to have jaded this 44-year-old scribe. On the contrary, he still finds it "stunning to see your work translated." Shutter Island, he says, "is a fever dream of a movie."

But don't be fooled. This edition of Dennis Lehane is wiser in the ways of Hollywood, an education born of his experiences watching Mystic River, Gone Baby Gone and now Shutter Island take life on celluloid. All the films were shot locally; Lehane spent time on their sets, learning and offering varying degrees of input. And from each movie, he drew different lessons that inform his hard-earned status as an A-list crime novelist.

"Understand," says Lehane, when a book becomes a film, "80 percent of the book is thrown out, 20 percent is captured. A book is an orange. A movie is a giraffe. Both are narrative forms of art. That's the end of similarity. Period."

SHUTTER ISLAND ALMOST DIDN'T COME TO BE.

AS IS OFTEN THE CASE with Tinseltown projects, big and small, Shutter Island almost didn't come to be. After Mystic River copped six Academy Award nominations, winning two (Sean Penn for best actor and Tim Robbins for best supporting actor), Lehane recalled recently, "My agent said this is going to make you three times as much a prick with Hollywood. You're spoiled."

He'd sold the Island movie rights to Columbia Pictures. Concerned about potential changes to the storyline, he retrieved the rights when the option lapsed. "I told my agent, it's not for sale. Unless I get what I want."

With those marching orders, Lehane's agent, Amy Schiffman, brought the book to fabled producer and studio head Mike Medavoy (seven best-picture Oscars including Annie Hall, Rocky and Silence of the Lambs). After an undisclosed but no doubt large sum changed hands, Medavoy was on board, and Lehane got creative clout as an executive producer.

They hired screenwriter Laeta Kalogridis (Alexander), whose script hewed close to the novel. ("I said, 'You're almost too respectful to the words.'") In October 2007, Medavoy got the script to DiCaprio, who in turn called his pal, Scorsese, the actor's collaborator on three films, including the Boston underworld epic The Departed. The two got together over a weekend, read Kalogridis' script and were "all jacked up," Lehane says. Medavoy, who'd helped produce Scorsese's Raging Bull, "made the deal happen."

"One of the reasons Dennis is so desirable in Hollywood is that he hasn't written his books as screenplays," says John Taylor "Ike" Williams, a lawyer and literary agent who specializes in cinema rights. "Ninety percent of feature films are based on books. But the biggest mistake a writer can make is to say this would make a great movie. That makes any good agent very, very nervous.

"With Lehane, what you get is a great narrative. And when a screenwriter, or producer, or director reads his words, they say, 'Oh my God. If I can get a Casey Affleck or a Sean Penn or a Leo DiCaprio, this role was made for him.' They see how the words project the character."

Shooting on Shutter Island began in and around Boston in March 2008. The plot centers on U.S. Marshals (DiCaprio and Mark Ruffalo) investigating the disappearance of a psychopathic murderess from a mental hospital, akin to Boston's long-shuttered Long Island Hospital for Chronic Disease. Lehane's role at that point was mostly as an interested observer. "Once you hire a director as good as Scorsese," he says, "the best thing you, as a producer/novelist, can do is get the f out of the way."

"ONCE YOU HIRE A DIRECTOR AS GOOD AS SCORSESE, THE BEST THING YOU CAN DO IS GET THE F* OUT OF THE WAY."

Scorsese, Lehane says, came as advertised: "Hyper-focused, aesthetically obsessive, reeks of brilliance, like a mad scientist. He thinks about movies all the time. Hearing music in his head, or remembering something from a movie 40 years ago. And he communicates in language only the script supervisor knows."

One day on the Island set, Lehane recalls, "we were doing take after take with Ben Kingsley (as the hospital's chief of staff) for a lousy pickup shot. Marty makes this little noise, and they know of all the takes, he liked that one. Very different from Clint (Eastwood, who directed Mystic River). Clint shows up and by the time of production, he's blocked it all out in his head. He does four takes and moves on. He says, 'I'm old-school. Hit your marks.'"

Of his three books-turned-movies, Lehane spent the most time on the set of Mystic River. It's clear that's also where he learned the most about how a Hollywood film takes shape. "Sean (Penn) came here a month early, with a beaten-up copy of the book, with all these yellow stickies," Lehane recalls. The two palled around a bit, going to places like Castlebar in Brighton and the nightclub Felt ("Sean's favorite," according to Lehane).

They were out the evening before they shot the chilling scene when Penn's character learns his daughter has been murdered. "The night before, we hashed it back and forth," Lehane says. "We agreed it was best if I wasn't there (during the shooting). He didn't need me looking over his shoulder or pulling him out of his reality."

Lehane says he and the prickly actor got along famously and have stayed in contact. "I don't understand why people don't like him, unless they don't want to work with a passionate, engaged—OK, a bit of a perfectionist. But I'm fine with that. I'm kind of a dickhead. I don't play nice. And that's the kind of guy I like. Life's too short for crap."

BEN AFFLECK, WHO directed Lehane's second novel-turned-movie, Gone Baby Gone, reminded him of Eastwood. "So gracious, a courtly director," he says. But like Eastwood, Affleck was no-nonsense. When he cast Michelle Monaghan, "I told Ben, 'That's not my Angie.' And he said, 'But it's the one I want to put up there.' I nodded in agreement."

One hurdle for Baby, and for all Lehane yarns—indeed for any movie that would win the hearts and minds of Bostonians—was the local accent. Affleck, being from here, "was terrified they'd get the accents wrong," Lehane recalls. The dialect has tripped up so many of Hollywood's finest, among them Martin Sheen, who sounded like he was channeling Bobby Kennedy in The Departed. (In Mystic River, Lehane admits, the accents "come and go.")

In Baby, they mostly came. Especially Amy Ryan, who "killed it," Lehane says—not just the accent, but the role of the South Boston harpie (earning her a best-supporting actress nomination). In fact, he says Ryan's performance came closer to how he imagined the character than any actor in a part he penned. (Interesting footnote: During his stint as a screenwriter for the highly acclaimed HBO cop series The Wire, Lehane wrote "a huge scene" for the actress, not knowing she would later be in Baby.)

Of course, Lehane came by his own Boston accent the same way he did his street savvy, growing up in St. Margaret's parish near Columbia Road in Dorchester, one of five kids of Irish immigrants. His mother was a school cafeteria worker, his father a foreman at Sears. A wiseacre with an altar-boy face, young Dennis had his share of street brawls, but he was upwardly mobile, attending Boston College High School and Eckerd College, a small liberal arts college in St. Petersburg, Florida. He also received a master's in creative writing from Florida International University in Miami.

In the mid-1990s, Lehane tried his hand at writing and directing Neighborhoods, an indie film that probably doesn't sound familiar. Around the same time, across the river, a couple of fellows named Damon and Affleck were writing the similarly themed Good Will Hunting. Lehane returned to books.

ONE HURDLE FOR BABY WAS THE LOCAL ACCENT. AMY RYAN "KILLED IT," LEHANE SAYS.

Now, eight novels, four movies and one anthology later, Dennis Lehane has taken the honored place once occupied by the late George V. Higgins (The Friends of Eddie Coyle) and the recently deceased Robert B. Parker (of the Spenser detective series). He's the undisputed poet laureate of the Boston demimonde.

LEHANE SPENDS ABOUT half his time these days in St. Petersburg, where he teaches at his alma mater and hosts an annual workshop called Writers in Paradise, with the likes of Anita Shreve and Stewart O'Nan. Part of St. Pete's pull, Lehane readily admits, is that it's the home of his second wife, an optometrist named Angela Bernardo. They have a seven-month-old daughter. But his heart, to say nothing of his goldmine, remains in Boston, never mind how dark a picture he paints of it.

"Yeah, and it's so bizarre that I'm so loved in Boston," he says, a bit abashed.

Lehane bristles at the suggestion that he writes books with Hollywood movies, and riches, in mind. "Yeah, I'm writing an 800-page book," he says, referring to his latest, The Given Day, "for an 800-minute movie. You ever hear of an 800-minute movie?"

Not that he disses the pragmatic element of creativity in film. The "guiding principle is art and commerce. Shutter Island had to be both. Not too exclusive. I mean, I didn't talk about getting Jim Jarmusch (the indie-auteur director of Broken Flowers fame). It's not avant-garde. And Jesus, I didn't give the movie to Michael Bay," who specializes in blockbusters like Transformers.

No, he got "Scorsese, the greatest living director in the United States. And Medavoy. His CV is humbling." And if that means Shutter Island comes with high expectations, so be it. "If Shutter Island doesn't work," Lehane says, "it's an honorable failure." ✖✖✖

EZRA FINALLY WATCHES THE GODFATHER.

BY EZRA DYER | ILLUSTRATIONS BY CHRIS VARRICCHIONE

IT'S TOUGH TO STAY CULTURALLY literate. Between YouTube, a zillion blogs and hundreds of TV channels, even the biggest pop-culture phenomenon only reaches a splintered audience. For example, I was at Lucky Strike Lanes a few weeks ago when the inescapable Beyoncé song "Sweet Dreams" started playing. The guy in the lane next to me fired up Shazam on his iPhone and used it to ID the song. I was incredulous. Really, dude? You need Shazam to recognize a Beyoncé song that's on the radio every 2.5 minutes?

Although I find that strange, he might find it odd that I have only a dim awareness of the Tron Guy. Or that I stopped watching Survivor after the Elisabeth Filarski season. Or that I can't pronounce "Gyllenhaal." But there's one medium we can all rally around, one enduring touchstone that still generates common ground at the watercooler: movies. Nobody puts baby in a corner! Am I right?

No, seriously, I'm asking. Because I hear that quote all the time, and I know it comes from Dirty Dancing, but I've never seen the film. What's the context for using that catchphrase? Is it strange if I yell it while lifting weights?

If you were to make a list of some of the biggest movies of all time—in terms of money, audience and cultural significance—it's a safe bet that I haven't seen many of them.

Whenever talk turns to films, I'm always the clueless one. I watched The Shawshank Redemption and The Sixth Sense within the past year, and only because I heard they had tricky endings, and I wanted to see them before someone spoiled the surprise. But that still leaves most non-comedies (and anything made pre-1990) languishing in the eternal Blockbuster aisle of popular movies that are off my radar.

I'm not sure how I missed Rocky, or The Godfather, or Star Wars. In the '80s, I was too busy watching Rad 46 times (I can still tell you exactly how to freestyle your BMX to the Real Life song "Send Me an Angel"). Since then, I've devoted too many leisure hours to trying to dunk a basketball. Someday, it'll just happen, like in White Men Can't Jump. Which I've seen.

But it's never too late to become culturally literate. So I decide to contact an expert to help me identify which films I need to watch in order to mitigate the constant cries of "You haven't seen that?" Matt Weatherford, the Filthy Critic, agrees to draft a list with me. Weatherford's reviews, on bigempire.com/filthy, are reliably funny, but I also consistently agree with his assessments. A critic who hates Burn After Reading as much as I do: This is the guy to consult.

Weatherford begins by qualifying his selections. "I suspect my top 10 is not very iconic and includes a lot of movies with Barely Legal in the title," he says. "Specifically 1, 2, 3, 4, 5, 6, 7 ,9, 10 and 11. Number 8 was a total letdown." I send Weatherford the lengthy list of movies I've yet to see, and he whittles it down to the ones he feels are most likely to bring me up to speed, cultural-touchstone-wise. "If you haven't seen Star Wars," he says, "that needs to be on your list. The story is about a gay space pirate running a shipment of phaser dildos to the Romulan Quartex. Very exciting." Weatherford then nominates six other films, with the caveat that he isn't necessarily endorsing their quality, just asserting that "when you've seen these movies, you'll be able to converse with two-thirds of the people who have nothing of their own to say." Those picks include The Godfather, Dirty Dancing, Goodfellas, Road House, Rocky, A Fish Called Wanda and Cocktail. Although, regarding that last one, Weatherford says, "I put Cocktail on there just to punish you. Few movies are more unpleasant."

Armed with his list, I add a few more picks, culled from iTunes, Comcast On Demand and the local Blockbuster. These include Red Dawn, Fast Times at Ridgemont High and Father of the Bride. Is Father of the Bride a chick flick? Couldn't say, because I can't bring myself to actually watch it. But here's my assessment of six of the others.

GOODFELLAS

Early on in Goodfellas, I blurt out, "Hey, is that Paulie Walnuts from The Sopranos?" Indeed it is. In fact, it seems like half the actors in Goodfellas also appear in The Sopranos, to the point that the movie almost feels like a prequel. Which is fine with me, because I loved The Sopranos. I keep pausing the film to cross-reference IMDB to figure out who's who. "I told you that guy who just walked down the stairs was Gay Vito!" I say, or "Are you kidding me? Joe Pesci needs to cut the crap with Christopher!" or "Phil Leotardo is an asshole here, too!" It takes me a long, long time to get through Goodfellas. But it's well worth it. Catchphrase I now understand: "What do you mean, I'm funny?"

THE GODFATHER

I didn't plan to go back-to-back with mob movies, but these are the only two flicks on my list available on demand, and I'm lazy. So, naturally, I'll start with the option that doesn't require me to get off the couch.

Since my view of the Mafia was shaped by The Sopranos (and now, Goodfellas), The Godfather comes across as pretty old-fashioned. I expect mobsters to wear sweatpants and gold chains, not suits. Then again, the beginning of the movie is set in the 1940s, when all guys wore suits, even to bed. It was a more formal time.

I won't spoil The Godfather for those of you who haven't seen it, but I will reveal that it's a Shakespearian tragedy in that everybody dies. Well, not everybody. But let's just say that you shouldn't get too attached to any particular character in this film.

I understand that it takes time to tell a story, but this one has some screwed-up pacing. The movie is three hours long, but you can get up for a sandwich and return to find that Michael moved to Sicily and got married. What? Also, the main actors—Marlon Brando and Al Pacino—are fantastic, but some of the secondary actors are horrible. When Sonny beats up his brother-in-law, it's WWE-quality stuff.

I'd say this is a good movie that would've been better if it were about an hour shorter. Which it could be. Easily. Catchphrase I now understand: "I'm gonna make him an offer he can't refuse."

FAST TIMES AT RIDGEMONT HIGH

First entry in my notes: "Judge Reinhold is the Jason Segel of the '80s." Hey, it's the accessible nice guy everyone can relate to! Second entry in my notes: "Sean Penn is the oldest high-schooler ever." Really. When this movie was made, Sean Penn was only 21 or 22, but he looked about 38. A hard 38. Nonetheless, he plays burnout surfer dude Jeff Spicoli, happy-go-lucky old-man high-school kid.

Fast Times has its funny moments—like when Reinhold declares, "I'm a single, successful guy," while scrubbing the words "Big Hairy Pussy" off a restaurant bathroom mirror—but it can't seem to decide whether it's a comedy or an afterschool special. There are jokes… but also, an abortion. Call me crazy, but I prefer to keep my high-school coming-of-age tale a little on the lighter side. Dazed and Confused never wades into deeper ideological territory than, "Does Ben Affleck have the right to spank freshmen if he can catch them with his Plymouth Duster?"

By the end of the movie, I think, "Wow, they should've made a spinoff built around Spicoli." Then

I realize that they did: Bill and Ted's Excellent Adventure. Catchphrase I now understand: "Aloha, Mr. Hand!"

RED DAWN

I feel like I'm always encountering references to this one. However, certain female parties at Improper confess to never having heard of it. I think my awareness of this film is a consequence of constantly reading about sports—it seems trendy to reference Red Dawn whenever there's a tale of an overmatched band of misfits struggling valiantly in the face of overwhelming odds. Which, in sports, happens just about every weekend, so you might see why I feel familiar with this movie already.

The premise of Red Dawn is that the Soviets (and Cubans) attack the United States, somehow dropping paratroopers into what looks like Colorado. The Commies go straight into a school and start shooting it up, and the hijinks ensue from there. A small band of Americans escapes and mounts a resistance, hiding in the mountains and ambushing the Russian forces.

As I watch Patrick Swayze, Jennifer Grey and company mounting their ragtag resistance from behind rocky escarpments, I think, "Huh, this is kind of like what the insurgents are doing to us in Afghanistan." Shortly thereafter, a Soviet commander says, "It's the same as Afghanistan. They'll never stop." It's a bit discomfiting when a movie as simplistic as Red Dawn makes a point about military tactics that will seem relevant 20 years after the end of the Cold War. Also, there's a part where one of the American guerrillas shoots an RPG at a helicopter. Which is, you know, exactly what happened with the whole Black Hawk Down debacle in Somalia.

Despite its creepy foretelling of actual military scenarios, this movie is horrible and enjoyable only for its ironic crappiness. Catchphrase I now understand: "Wolverines!" Honorable mention: "When you grow up, you'll know these things, Danny. Now get up here and piss in the radiator."

THE FILTHY CRITIC'S PICKS

DANTO THREE USER BY CATEGORIES FOR VIEWING PLEASURE

Not to say they're bad, just that they're most often the films pretentious people, who may or may not actually like them, will judge you by. Personally, I've only seen six of these.

1. Un Chien Andalou
2. Reckless
3. Jules et Jim
4. The Bicycle Thief
5. Le Temps du Loup
6. There Will Be Blood
7. (500) Days of Summer
8. Requiem for a Dream
9. Rashomon
10. Donnie Darko

Again, not to say these are good or bad, just loved by people who usually think about movies the same way they do flour in the supermarket. Maybe less. Personally, I enjoyed 2.5 of these.

1. Shawshank Redemption
2. The Big Lebowski
3. The Breakfast Club
4. Back to the Future
5. Office Space
6. Stand by Me
7. The Princess Bride
8. A Fish Called Wanda
9. Little Miss Sunshine
10. Napoleon Dynamite

I've never seen all of any smart person's top 10, and I'm always tempted to put The Bicycle Thief or Reckless on my list just to look smarter. That said:

1. The Treasure of the Sierra Madre
2. Blue Velvet
3. Wings of Desire
4. North by Northwest
5. The Maltese Falcon
6. This is Spinal Tap
7. City of God
8. The Incredibles
9. Miller's Crossing
10. The King of Kong

ROCKY

The most surprising thing about Rocky (the character, not the movie) is that he's a hipster. He's got his leather jacket, his porkpie hat, his skinny jeans. He lives in an up-and-coming neighborhood that hasn't yet been ruined by gentrification. He has two pet turtles named Cuff and Link. His crew wears matching pink cardigans. Dare I add that outside Rocky's apartment, groups of guys stand around at night singing a cappella? I'm not making any of that up. Rocky is set in Philadelphia, but you could imagine he lives in the South End, back when it was edgy.

I like Rocky. Mostly because the characters are complicated enough to be interesting. Rocky isn't pure good (he works for the mob), and his adversary, Apollo Creed, isn't pure bad. In fact, Creed hooks Rocky up in a big way. Rocky's girlfriend, Adrian is a bit two-dimensional, though. Early in the movie, I jot down, "Is Adrian mentally challenged or just the most socially awkward person ever?" Later on, one of the gangsters says, "I hear she's retarded!" Rocky replies, "She ain't retarded. She's just shy." I'd say that answers my question, but later on Rocky tells Adrian that he's a southpaw, and she asks, "What's a southpaw?"

If I had to write a blurb for this movie, I'd paraphrase Rocky's trainer, Mickey: Watching Rocky is like eating lightning and crapping thunder. Catchphrase I now understand: "Adrian!"

A FISH CALLED WANDA

This film has moments where John Cleese's Monty Python sense of humor pokes through, but mostly it offers the kind of jokes you see on can Koozies. Hey, that guy who just got called vulgar responded with a profanity! That's unexpected, and therefore funny!

Perhaps one of the biggest problems with this movie, 22 years after its release, is that the entire plot hinges on Jamie Lee Curtis being an irresistible sex object. And that concept might be plausible if she'd simply kept a low profile. Instead, every time you turn on the TV, you find her discussing juicy fiber-filled BMs with women who are all stopped up. So it's hard to see her strip down to lingerie without imagining that she's about to say, "Excuse me for a second! This Activia's really kicking in." Catchphrase I now understand: None. No catchphrase ever came from this film.

I'LL ADMIT that's as far as I got. A solid 13 hours or so invested in this project, and I still haven't seen Star Wars, Dirty Dancing, Road House or Cocktail. I looked for them at Blockbuster, but I guess there wasn't enough shelf space, what with the two copies of Howard the Duck.

Speaking of Blockbuster, let's just say I wouldn't buy stock in that company right now. When I rented the movies that I could find there, the cashier looked at her computer and said, "It looks like you bought I Love You, Man." She then retrieved said DVD from a drawer. Turns out, I rented that cinema classic last year and took too long to return it, so Blockbuster charged me something like $40. Call it the stupidity tax, but that will be the last DVD I ever buy. Because when you finish watching a rental from On Demand (my source for Goodfellas and The Godfather) or iTunes (which I used for Rocky and A Fish Called Wanda), you never have to worry about making a $40 mind fart. Not to mention Netflix. Screw you, Blockbuster.

As for my newfound film knowledge, I'm going to flaunt it all over the place. Next time I'm at a party, I plan to make offers people can't refuse, and tell everyone that women weaken legs, and that all I need are some tasty waves, a cool buzz and I'm fine. And then I'll change the subject to the latest "You haven't seen that?" That's right, Avatar. I see you.

In my profession, I have to have something that makes me pop. Otherwise, why am I there? I can't get to the E! network that way. Giuliana Rancic... I'm coming for your head!
About 80 percent of my wardrobe is vintage. I like things to be one-of-a-kind.
I shop at Morgan Memorial Goodwill, Second Time Around, the Garment District. Some of my best finds are from these places.
I like a feel-good, sassy, comfortable look that's edgy and professional.
I'm a big online shopper, too.

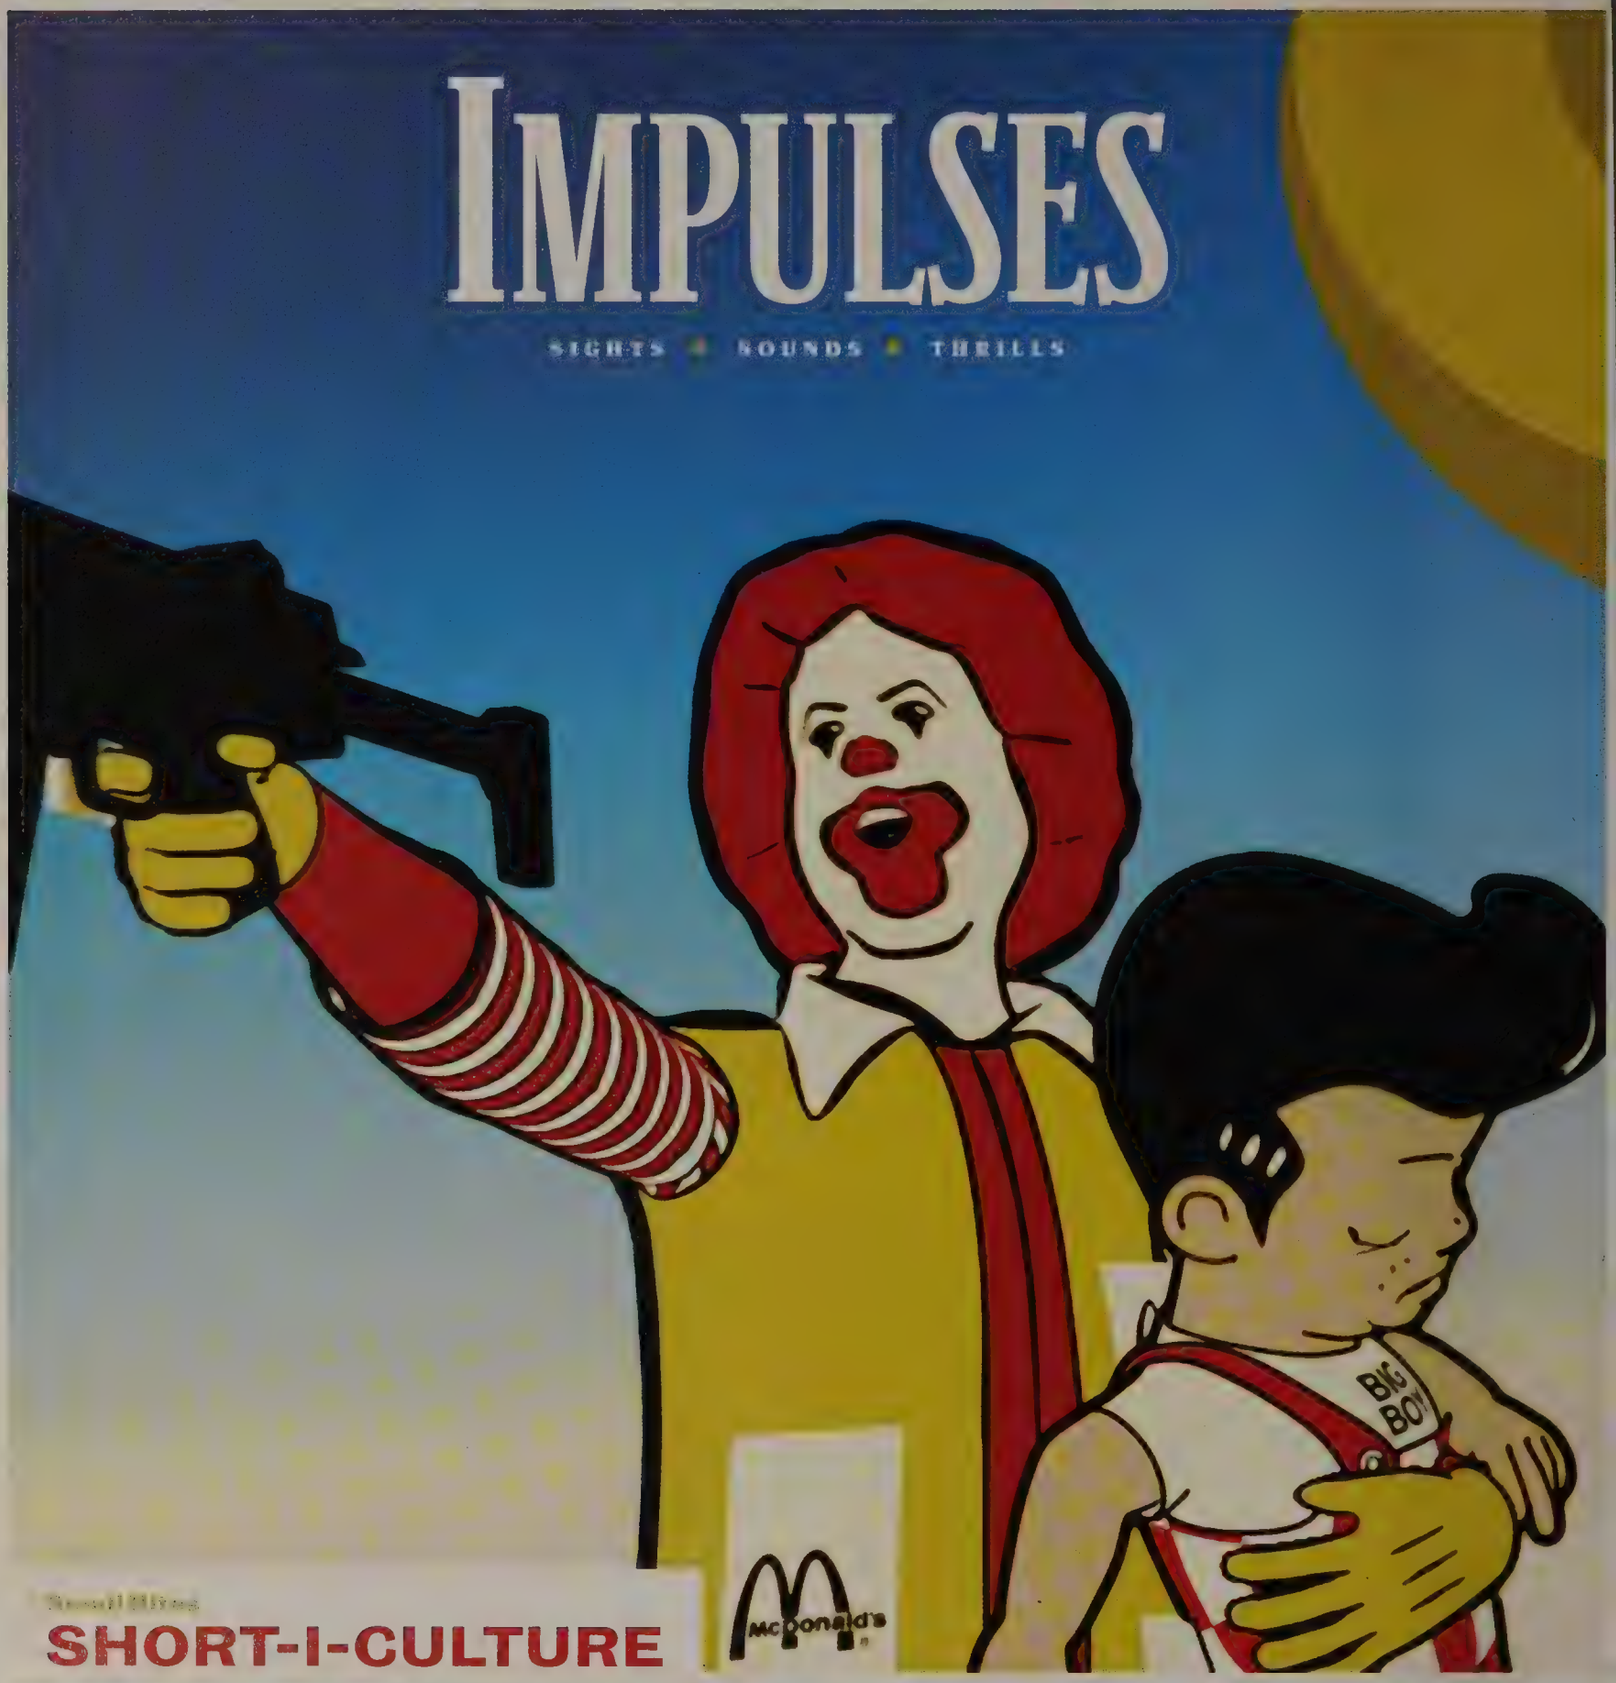
I like to mix high-end with low-end, so people don't know the difference. Perception is reality, and if you exude whatever you feel that day, it shows.

These pants are the real deal vintage. They were like $10. I found these bad boys, and if no one likes them, I love them. I can wear them with flat gladiators or heels.



I never go in a store if I know I have limited time.

Layering is really important. I admire that about New Yorkers; they put on one outfit and wear it from 7–4 am.

A Cure for What Ales

Lifting Spirits On Feb. 22, Gosder Cherilus, a former BC Eagle (yay!) and current Detroit Lion (yikes!), teams up with 6one7 Productions and the New England Revolution's Shalrie Joseph to raise money for his native Haiti. At Stoddard's Fine Food & Ale, enjoy cocktails, hors d'oeuvres and the knowledge that your donation will help send doctors to the earthquake-ravaged country through the Haiti Outreach Mission. It's not as simple as a text and a notice on your phone bill, but it's a lot more fun. Domenica Cerasaro

Court Disorder

Journalist Justice

It helps to have the media's attention when you're accused of homicide—just ask OJ. In Masha Obolensky's Not Enough Air, journalist-turned-playwright Sophie Treadwell finds herself drawn to the scandalous murder-trial of housewife Ruth Snyder, and she's driven to translate the story to the stage. This drama about a drama (about a tragedy) explores what happens when society pushes a woman to the edge. See it through March 14 at the Central Square Theatre.

Movies Edited by Nick Altschuller and Amanda Knorr

Capsules by Sean Burns

Avatar ★ ½ Twelve years and some $400 million later, James Cameron's latest opus lands with a thud. Sure, you can admire the 3-D presentation, performance-capture technique and computer animation. (If you're not already impressed enough, characters keep elbowing you in the ribs, a reminder that you're watching something amazing.) This is groundbreaking, next-level technology, and I was bored out of my damn mind. Looking like a tacky airbrush painting, Avatar is CGI eye candy by way of prog-rock album covers with an absence of characterization and an abundance of corny dialogue. Unabashedly ripping off Terrence Malick's The New World, Kevin Costner's Dances With Wolves and his own Aliens, Cameron sends Sam Worthington's crippled space marine to a distant planet to reenact a banal white-guy-saves-the-natives fantasy. It feels recycled, rehashed and more like an F/X demo reel than an actual movie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Blind Side ★ The inspirational true story of the Baltimore Ravens' Michael Oher becomes one of the year's most inadvertently offensive movies, thanks to Sandra Bullock's rampaging ego and the kind of unconscious racism Hollywood does better than anyone else. Oher, the troubled son of a crack addict, spent much of his childhood homeless before being adopted by a rich, white family who kindly helped him fulfill his potential. But instead of focusing on Oher's moving struggle, The Blind Side spends two hours inviting us to worship the selflessness of his new mom, played by Bullock as an amalgamation of Julia Roberts' least appealing qualities. She fires off sassy one-liners in endless glamour shots, while the rest of the cast nods approvingly and tells us how great she is. Oher, played by Quinton Aaron, is given no thoughts of his own. He just thanks her profusely and does what he's told. This isn't a movie about adopting a son; it's about adopting a pet. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Book of Eli ★ ½ Essentially The Road for Dummies, directors Allen and Albert Hughes' postapocalyptic slog stars Denzel Washington as a taciturn, almost supernaturally gifted protector of the last remaining copy of the King James Bible. Hacking and slashing off limbs to spread the word of God (which I think may be missing the point), Washington keeps The Good Book from falling into the hands of nasty folk like Gary Oldman's scenery-chewing whorehouse owner. Oldman's predictably hambone performance nods to Ian McShane's immortal work in Deadwood, and it's fascinating how much the Hughes Brothers slave to replicate sequences from other movies without coming up with an original idea of their own. There's more than a little Mad Max, with certain scenes stolen outright from Children of Men. As if the constant visual references to Sergio Leone's spaghetti Westerns weren't enough, one of the characters can't stop whistling Ennio Morricone music cues. There's nothing here you haven't seen done before, and done better. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Crazy Heart ★★ ½ In his best performance since The Big Lebowski, Jeff Bridges stars as a washed-up, alcoholic country singer touring lousy Southwestern dive bars. Scott Cooper's debut feature initially boasts a grungy authenticity, but just when you think Crazy Heart is on its way to being The Wrestler of country music, a banal redemption formula kicks in and sends the whole film reeling off into inspirational TV-movie land. The too-young Maggie Gyllenhaal proves an improbable love interest for Bridges' seedy troubadour, and (an excellent) Colin Farrell drops by as a former protégé who makes success look far too easy. The grim, admirable desolation of the film's early passages is quickly abandoned for garden-variety uplift and clichéd rehab scenes. The late-game addition of Robert Duvall as a curmudgeonly AA aficionado only adds to the phoniness. These brave performances deserved better. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Edge of Darkness ★★★ It's been eight years since Mel Gibson last played a leading role, and despite whatever qualms you may have about his occasional drunken rants, there's still nobody better at acting furious onscreen. Gibson's comeback attempt is a hard-boiled, extremely grim Boston noir that allows Mel to do what he does best. He gets really angry and either shoots people or punches them in the face. Director Martin Campbell, condensing his six-hour BBC miniseries to feature-length, has a bit of trouble retrofitting all the sprawling plot lines into an abbreviated running time, but the gist of it remains. Very bad

THE KISS-OFF

It's not me. It's you.

Dear John ★ ½
Starring Channing Tatum, Amanda Seyfried, Richard Jenkins, Scott Porter and Henry Thomas. Screenplay by Jamie Linden. Based on the novel by Nicholas Sparks. Directed by Lasse Hallström.

Sony Pictures Entertainment

DEAR DEAR JOHN,
I begin this letter as a thank-you note. Many far superior movies have tried and failed to knock Avatar off the top of the weekly box-office charts. You should be commended for this accomplishment. Despite any disagreements about your merits, let me also thank you for being an hour shorter than Avatar, for not having a single nine-foot blue character and, at the very least, not forcing me to view your story through stupid, headache-inducing glasses.

All that said, I worry that the author of your source material, bestselling novelist Nicholas Sparks, has a dysfunctional view of contemporary relationships. If I can be honest with you, John, I don't actually read his books. (Life is busy, and we have Jersey Shore now.) But I have seen an alarming number of films based on his work. Sparks specializes in treacly tales of brief encounters enshrined for all time as idealized memories of impossible loves. I've watched A Walk to Remember, Message in a Bottle, The Notebook, Nights in Rodanthe and, now you, Dear John. Yet the formula remains consistent throughout, and personally I find it troubling.

Take you, for example. Channing Tatum stars as John Tyree, a grizzled Special Forces vet who wins the heart of Amanda Seyfried's Savannah Curtis after she stupidly drops her purse off a pier, and he dives into the water to rescue it. We know Savannah is a good person because she likes horses and is kind to autistic people, while John suffers from a troubled past I frankly had a hard time understanding because, handsome as he may be, Tatum tends to mumble like he's auditioning for Benicio Del Toro's role in The Usual Suspects.

These two spend a passionate couple of weeks together in a beautiful beachside community falling madly in love. It's like the prologue of Grease, before the songs start. Alas, John is shipped back overseas, and the two begin a wildly verbose correspondence. Being the only 20-somethings on the planet who've never heard of the Internet, they pen long, languid letters that go into great detail about the moonlight, coin collections, and how much they so truly and deeply love one another.

I think it's a cowardly vision.

Then 9/11 has to go and ruin everything, and after John reenlists, the jilted Savannah takes up with the much older, extremely creepy-looking kid from E.T., who ends up suffering from some strange form of cancer that makes his beard fall out but not the rest of his hair. This tragic nonsense carries on for seven years or so, long past any reasonable point when someone might finally get over a summer fling. In any sane world, John and Savannah would've forgotten all about one another until the day they became awkward Facebook friends, and the only unanswered question would be: "Even though we banged in 2000, is it OK that I hide your boring status updates from my news feed?"

So I wonder, Dear John, what sort of grudge your author is holding against actual relationships? Granted, you aren't as callous as Sparks' other films. (Usually he just kills off one of the lovers.) But when your primary narrative strategy is to keep star-crossed couples from ever spending time with each other, doesn't that lend itself to a rather limited concept of romance? Personally, I thought Richard Linklater's belated sequel Before Sunset did a particularly fine job of pointing out just how destructive these overidealized memories can become. It was a remarkable achievement considering how much the first film, Before Sunrise, made me want to vomit.

Relationships are hard. Other people have annoying habits, no matter how much you love them. They say dopey things at inappropriate times; they enjoy music you hate; they suffer terrifying effects after eating too much Mexican food. But none of this ever happens in Sparks' pristine fantasyland because nobody ever gets to know each other that well. Yet these tales are being sold as the loves that define a lifetime?

And sorry, John, but you're inert. Directed by the once-talented Lasse Hallström, the shots are all golden, sun-dappled moments of posed pristine beauty. Even the Middle East combat sequences look like postcards, and autism comes off as a quirk. I think it's a cowardly vision. No matter how thoroughly you wring the tear ducts of your target audience, I'd like to believe that real love is messier than all this.

But thanks again for kicking Avatar's butt.

people killed Gibson's daughter. Now he's going to make them pay. Creepy, borderline psychotic and, to put it bluntly, not aging well, Gibson is a stout, angry bulldog with a laughable Roslindale accent. He's also wicked awesome. Campbell smartly plays upon the actor's diminished good looks, short stature and air of dissolution. Mel's back, but the years have not been kind. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

An Education ★★ ½ In what's sure to be Roman Polanski's favorite film of the year, dazzling newcomer Carey Mulligan stars as a 16-year-old schoolgirl who falls under the sway of Peter Sarsgaard's suave 30-something hepcat in gloomy, postwar Britain. Adapted by novelist Nick Hornby from Lynn Barber's memoir, the movie takes a tender look back at statutory rape as a rite of passage, and it's a testament to some fine performances that the film only feels icky in retrospect. There's nobody better than Hornby at dissecting all the ways people like to define themselves through their tastes and fascinations, but in nearly every other respect, his screenplay is too fussy and neat for its own good. This is a very polite, middlebrow view of what must've actually been an extremely messy affair. Director Lone Scherfig keeps everything humming pleasantly along, with even the inevitable betrayals and recriminations occurring at a genteel pitch. It's as if all the characters are afraid to raise their voices. The feel-good final reel is almost unforgivable. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Extraordinary Measures ★★ What happened to Harrison Ford? Once the biggest movie star in the world, carrying both the Star Wars and Indiana Jones series with his roguish charm, he's somehow aged into a growling, miserable old crank with a keen eye for crap. It's shocking to see this formerly towering icon playing second fiddle to Brendan Fraser in such a shoddy, disease-of-the-week TV movie. The first venture from CBS Films betrays its small screen origins, as it's full of flat lighting and pedestrian medium shots. The perpetually weepy Fraser stars as a sad dad of two kids stricken by a rare muscle disease. He hustles to fund an experimental enzyme-replacement treatment, pioneered by Ford's prickly, distinctly unlikable scientist. Ford's bristling jerkiness is this predictable picture's lone asset. After wallowing in manipulative close-ups of children in wheelchairs, the artist formerly known as Han Solo barks, bellows, blasts classic rock in his laboratory and does nothing whatsoever to ingratiate himself to the audience. He's much meaner and more interesting than the material. (In the suburbs.)

Fantastic Mr. Fox ★★★ ½ Writer/director Wes Anderson's fastidious, sometimes suffocating, attention to costume detail and production design make his movies feel like they're taking place in dollhouses, so it makes sense that he would work with puppets. Rendered in hand-crafted, stop-motion animation, this marvelous adaptation of the Roald Dahl story may look like one of those Rankin-Bass holiday specials from the 1970s, but it still feels like a Wes Anderson film. It's got the filmmaker's dysfunctional family pathos and droll hipster humor, only with woodland animals instead of actors. George Clooney voices the title character, a reformed chicken-thief turned newspaper columnist itching to return to his criminal roots. His antics stoke the ire of three nasty farmers, and Mr. Fox and family find themselves on the run. Boasting bone-dry vocal turns from Meryl Streep, Jason Schwartzman and Bill Murray, the movie feels like a summation of Anderson's career thus far, with certain scenes lifted almost directly from The Royal Tenenbaums and The Life Aquatic With Steve Zissou. (At Coolidge Corner and in the suburbs.)

So Bad It's Good

Awfully Funny From its mysterious beginnings on an L.A. billboard to its current cult status, Los Angeles' best-kept secret has finally made its way to the East Coast. Ladies and gentlemen, enter The Room. This hilariously awful tale of the tormented Johnny, whose evil fiancée begins sleeping with his dopey best friend, has been dubbed "the Citizen Kane of bad movies." Head over to Coolidge Corner Theatre on Feb. 20 to catch the greatest worst film ever made. Don't say we didn't warn you. Domenica Cerasaro

44 Inch Chest ★★ Great British character actors spouting vulgarity should be more fun than this. Director Malcolm Venville, working from a deliriously profane screenplay by Sexy Beast writers Louis Mellis and David Scinto, crams Ray Winstone, Ian McShane, John Hurt, Tom Wilkinson and Stephen Dillane into a tiny room for an asphyxiating chamber piece of nonstop trash talk. Turns out Winstone's low-level gangster has a cheating wife (the still lovely Joanne Whalley), and his underworld pals were kind enough to snatch her secret love and stash him in an abandoned warehouse. The men get together and gab, waiting all night for the sobbing Winstone to drink up enough nerve to kill the man who cuckolded him. Alas, with the one cramped location and constant blathering monologues, the piece feels like a stage play awkwardly transposed onto film. It's claustrophobic, repetitive and nowhere near as revelatory as it would like to think it is. Tough guys talk a big game, but deep down they're all frightened little boys. Been there, done that. (At Kendall Square.)

The Imaginarium of Dr. Parnassus ★★ Terry Gilliam can't catch a break. The 2002 documentary Lost in La Mancha chronicles The Man Who Killed Don Quixote, Gilliam's aborted project that fell victim to natural disasters, catastrophic health problems and general bad planning. Just when things were starting to look up, Gilliam took on The Imaginarium of Dr. Parnassus. First, star Heath Ledger passed away, then producer William Vince succumbed to cancer. During post-production, the director was hit by a car and broke his back. I wish I could report a triumph over impossible odds, but this film is an unholy mess. Christopher Plummer stars as an immortal, old-time street performer lugging a stage set across modern-day London, while gambling with the devil (Tom Waits) over how many souls he can save. Ledger turns up as a con man, with Johnny Depp, Colin Farrell and Jude Law filling his shoes every now and again. It's a stumbling, patchy movie that's interesting at moments but confounding in the end. (Harvard Square and the Waltham Embassy.)

Invictus ★★★ For such a straightforward, often clumsy crowd-pleaser, Clint Eastwood's latest still feels like a marvel of restraint. Indeed, Invictus is an exercise in doing less with more. Recently elected Nelson Mandela (Morgan Freeman) seeks to reconcile a deeply divided South Africa by rallying the public behind their largely white rugby team, which had long been considered a symbol of institutionalized racism. Like Eastwood's Flags of Our Fathers, Invictus is about how cynical, insincere political calculations are often necessary to serve the greater good. Eastwood's not great at shooting sports, but he gets a sly, complicated performance out of Freeman, and there's some predictably fine, understated work from Matt Damon as the team captain. This should've been the hokiest movie ever made, but Eastwood plays it quietly and close to the vest. (In the suburbs.)

It's Complicated ★★★ There's such a lightness to Meryl Streep's work these days—even in something as wretched as Mamma Mia!—that she seems to be having the time of her life. Same goes for Alec Baldwin, whose middle-aged paunch has unleashed his inner comedian. Writer/director Nancy Meyers honestly doesn't have to do much besides put these dynamos together and let them riff. Playing a couple that's been divorced for a decade, Streep and Baldwin drunkenly hook up the night before their son's college graduation and spend the rest of the movie negotiating the horny aftershocks. Baldwin's remarried to a bitchy younger woman (Lake Bell, harshly photographed to give Streep the advantage) while Meryl finds herself in a tentative courtship with Steve Martin's sensitive architect. Like most Meyers movies, this one wallows uncomfortably in ostentatious displays of wealth. But there's no denying the giddy chemistry between Streep and Baldwin. They're both having so much fun it's contagious. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Legion ★ ½ Holy crap. This theologically goofy rip-off of The Terminator stars Paul Bettany as the archangel Michael, who falls to Earth after God gets fed up with humanity and decides to throw a low-rent apocalypse. For reasons that are never explained, Adrianne Palicki's chain-smoking, trailer-trash waitress is eight-months pregnant with the savior of mankind. After loading up on ammo and sawing off his wings, our badass angel holes up in a desolate diner, disobeys his holy orders and shoots cretins in the head until the miracle kid is finally born. And, oh, what a wacky bunch of stereotypes we have in this joint! There's a rich guy, a black guy and even Dennis Quaid! Longtime special-effects guru Scott Stewart's directorial debut is a cheap-looking siege movie gussied up with vague religious affectations, which become all the more offensive because they never bother to make any sense. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Lovely Bones ★ ½ Peter Jackson, New Zealand's splatter-movie hero turned tedious golden boy, took on Alice Sebold's beloved novel and conceived the kind of film that only somebody convinced of their own genius could create. The Lovely Bones isn't just a lousy picture; it's bad on a legendary scale. The story of a child's rape and murder shouldn't produce such peals of laughter, but Jackson's gaudy representations of the afterlife, mawkish sentimentality and all-around tastelessness borders on camp. After young Susie (Saoirse Ronan) falls victim to Stanley Tucci's twitchy neighborhood pervert, the movie splays out in a hundred confounding directions, including a tacky CGI heaven full of New Age hokum. While the criminally miscast Mark Wahlberg wallows in grief over his daughter's murder, Susan Sarandon drops by for bad comic relief as the drunken grandma. Jackson keeps the emotional pitch of every scene cranked to 11, crushing the delicacy of Sebold's tale beneath elaborate trick-shots and juvenile, hyperbolic hysteria. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Nine ★ Rob Marshall is back with a desultory take on Federico Fellini's 8 ½, and it's a travesty. Much like Marshall's pitifully unimaginative adaptation of Chicago, Nine is a musical for people who hate musicals, again confining the singing and dancing numbers to a black soundstage that exists only in the imagination—because God forbid anybody bursts into song in a musical. Fellini's playfully sad reverie has been adapted by Michael Tolkin and the late Anthony Minghella, two desperately serious screenwriters who make the fatal mistake of treating a comic predicament as the stuff of grand tragedy. Daniel Day-Lewis might be our greatest living actor, but he couldn't possibly be more wrong for this role, replacing Marcello Mastroianni's debauched delight with angst, hand-wringing and temper tantrums. He also seems about as Italian as a shepherd's pie. (In the suburbs.)

Sherlock Holmes ★★★ ½ Folks who grew up on the tweedy elegance of Basil Rathbone's 1940s B-movies might quibble with director Guy Ritchie's presentation of Sherlock Holmes (Robert Downey Jr.) as a loutish, bare-knuckle-brawling, manic-depressive. However, I found the film to be the most pleasant surprise I've had at the theater since Star Trek. It's a jaunty, very funny picture. So often in action movies brainpower is synonymous with weakness, but the script presents intelligence as just another form of bad-assery, with Holmes using his encyclopedic knowledge of human anatomy to overcome foes twice his size. Downey and Jude Law's Watson have the easy, bristling chemistry of an old married couple, and Sherlock's only problems arrive when the screenplay keeps them apart. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Twilight Saga: New Moon ★ And you thought the first one was terrible? This second installment of Stephenie Meyer's awful ode to sexual repression is so glum, dreary and snail-paced, it feels like it plays in slow-motion. Pining, as always, for sparkly vampire Edward Cullen (Robert Pattinson, still looking vaguely embarrassed to be here), Kristen Stewart's depressed Bella pouts, whines and stares off into space a lot. With Edward out of the picture for most of the running time, she tries to distract herself with the happy, shirtless visage of Taylor Lautner's Jacob. But Bella has rotten luck with boys, as every guy who takes a shine to her seems to end up being some sort of supernatural beast. Though his waxed chest might lead you to believe otherwise, Jacob is actually a werewolf, and so we suffer through more of Meyer's lame mythology and lots of annoying emo posturing. It takes an awfully long time for nothing to happen in New Moon. (In the suburbs.)

Up in the Air ★★★ ½ Director Jason Reitman's sturdy, crowd-pleasing adaptation of Walter Kirn's novel is best when it allows George Clooney to subtly toy with and deconstruct his tabloid persona. Clooney stars as a blissfully single corporate tool who spends 300 days a year flying from town to town, firing folks whenever their cowardly bosses need to outsource the axing. Streamlined, efficient and preaching a gospel of "no luggage," Clooney meets his match in Vera Farmiga's randy road warrior and finds himself forced to rethink his philosophy when Anna Kendrick's up-and-coming protégée threatens his way of life. It's slick, classy entertainment, more beholden to Billy Wilder than Judd Apatow. Reitman's occasional bouts of glibness are no match for Clooney's seemingly effortless, soul-searching work. The handsome bastard is able to suggest sudden, midlife bouts of yearning without making a big show of it. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The White Ribbon ★★★ Michael Haneke, the harsh, professorial director behind Funny Games and Caché, loves to punish his audience. His latest, which won the Palme D'Or at last year's Cannes Film Festival, is no exception. Filmed in high-contrast black-and-white with Haneke's usual air of viciousness and lack of music, The White Ribbon tells the sad, elliptical tale of a small pre-WWI German town infected with casual sadism. There's something reminiscent of Village of the Damned in Haneke's presentation of the town's children, tormented by their vicious, dictatorial parents until animal abuse and casual acts of torture are practically inevitable. Like his other films, there's a dazzling command of formal cinematic technique in the service of a one-note thesis. Haneke's attempting to depict Nazism in prepubescent form. The White Ribbon is a bit too easy and pleased with itself but still impossible to shake. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

Youth in Revolt ★★ Michael Cera's gawky, stammering virgin routine proved hilarious in Superbad and earned him incalculable goodwill on Arrested Development. Yet he seems stuck in first gear, delivering identical performances in every project since. Based on the novel by CD Payne, Miguel Arteta's latest is a bumbling mess, but at least it allows Cera to add a few shadings on his patented persona. Cera starts as Nick Twisp, mopey son to a slatternly mother (Jean Smart) who endures countless humiliations from her trashy boyfriends. One summer, Nick flips head over heels for Sheeni Saunders (fetching newcomer Portia Doubleday). In a desperate attempt to woo the sophisticated, promiscuous Sheeni, Nick invents an alternate persona named François Dillinger, a mouthy arsonist with a yen for cigarettes and vehicular mayhem. It's as this rowdy alter ego that Cera finally breaks out, using voluminous profanity and an acerbic attitude that's hilarious when emanating from his wispy frame and baby-face. (At Fenway and in the suburbs.)

COUNTERPOINT

Pianist Robert Glasper balances his love for jazz and hip-hop.

Robert Glasper plays the Regattabar on Feb. 27.

Joel Taylor

ROBERT GLASPER RARELY has just one thing going. Take the Grammy Awards. The jazz pianist attended last month's show as a nominee for Best Urban/Alternative performance, for a track from his latest CD. But he also performed in R&B star Maxwell's backing band, whose members anchor the Robert Glasper Experiment.

"That's my life right now, double-booked," says Glasper, who called his new CD Double-Booked because it splits tracks between his jazz trio and the Experiment, a hip-hop/soul fusion outfit.

"I'm kind of straddling both worlds," says Glasper, 32. "A lot of times, I like to have Experiment and trio gigs the same night, so I'll run from one gig to the other." Then there are shows with Maxwell, in addition to work as musical director for rapper Mos Def, who guests on Double-Booked. Likewise, neo-soul singer Bilal graces that album's Grammy-nominated "All Matter."

Glasper's connections in hip-hop, R&B and soul clearly run as deep as they do in jazz. He cut his jazz teeth with Christian McBride, Roy Hargrove and Terence Blanchard. Yet he went to high school in Houston with Beyoncé, recorded with Kanye West, and shared stages with Jay-Z, Erykah Badu, Q-Tip and the Roots.

"Jazz has a tendency to feel like an elitist program, like a golf club," Glasper says from his New York home. "It used to be people crossing [worlds]. You could go to a jazz show, and you'd see NBA players, actors, comedians—famous people."

Now, he says, "Jazz is getting lost in the new generation. This generation doesn't grasp onto it. The grasp gets looser and looser every few years. So hip-hop is the new jazz."

It's hard to find both styles (along with gospel and pop) as neatly integrated as they are in Glasper's music. Other pianists from Brad Mehldau to Ethan Iverson have put their own spin on Radiohead. But on his acclaimed 2007 trio disc In My Element, Glasper seamlessly merges a Radiohead tune with one by Herbie Hancock, another jazz pianist who advanced funky fusion. And in "J Dillalude," he splices live takes on rhythms of the late hip-hop beatmaster J Dilla, a onetime collaborator. In concert, Glasper often vamps in repetitive patterns that echo hip-hop loops.

> "Jazz is getting lost in the new generation.... Hip-hop is the new jazz."

"I love emulating stuff like that," he says. "A big portion of hip-hop comes from jazz. [Hip-hop acts] sample jazz trios or sample jazz piano. So I like to reverse it and put it onstage."

His dynamic is matched by drummer Chris Dave, who flashes his command of both jazz and hip-hop as the other constant in both Glasper groups. "He keeps me from falling asleep at my own gig," Glasper says. "We can stay on the groove a long time, because we love to be in the pocket and not go crazy all the time."

They also keep it spontaneous. "I probably only know the first two songs we play," Glasper says. "After that, it's where the music takes us. We just go with it, so it's always a different experience, for us and for the audience."

Double-Booked accents Glasper's different group experiences. The trio, with acoustic bassist Vicente Archer aboard, shifts from the lyrical "Yes I'm Country (and That's OK)" to a frisky romp through Thelonious Monk's "Think of One." Then the Experiment, which features electric bassist Derrick Hodge and saxophonist Casey Benjamin, lays into a more atmospheric, funky vibe.

Either way, Glasper sticks to Fender Rhodes and acoustic piano. "I don't like bands that are too keyboard-heavy," he says. "Some people use keyboard sounds to define the music they're playing, versus organically defining the music by what you're playing."

Glasper's primary inspiration was his mother, a gospel singer/pianist who knew about double-booking herself. In addition to church, Kim Yvette rustled up R&B, soul, jazz and country gigs.

"In my house, there was always some kind of music playing, from all kind of genres," says Glasper, who began playing church services as a teenager. "I happened to grow up a musical mutt." ×××

Shamrock 'n' Roll

Erin Go Rah Apart from overcrowded pubs, nothing says St. Patrick's Day in Boston like Celtic punk-rock shows. In a preview of performances to come (Dropkick Murphys, anyone?), Flogging Molly hits House of Blues in a blaze of Hibernian glory on Feb. 27. The seven-piece band's roaring blend of fiddles, tin whistles and electric guitars combines their Dublin folk and L.A. punk roots seamlessly. Known for their high-energy, sing-along sets, they're a straight shot of traditional musicianship with a chaser of growling swagger. Hayley Miller

Color Coded

Simple Pleasures

Kicking off his career in 1970s California, artist George Lloyd learned a thing or two about color. His work takes a bright, fresh stance on ordinary objects, such as pink coffee pots, aqua faucets and neon tabletops. Cheer yourself up at his Paintings and Drawings From the Figurative Period exhibit at Acme Fine Art through March 6.

History Lessons

Too Close for Comfort

A teacher confronts his own past in Safe From the Neighbors, the latest work from Steve Yarbrough. Luke May's obsession with civil-rights history is intensified by the reappearance of an old friend whose mother was murdered during the movement's height. As May investigates the circumstances of her death, he makes startling discoveries. Yarbrough reads from his novel on Feb. 19 at Harvard Book Store.

THE RAY TYE MEDICAL AID FOUNDATION
WE WILL NEVER STOP CARING

A LETTER FROM RWANDA

You have a nice welcome note when someone searches for your Foundation. It says

WE NEVER STOP CARING!
WHEN YOU SAVE A LIFE
YOU SAVE THE FUTURE.

Allow me to congratulate for this mission because you put it in practice, you do not only say it. Today, my objective is to thank you so much for paying my heart surgery.

I would like to be a doctor when I grow up and help other as you helped me. I wish to be a cardiologist, and I will like to come back to the United States for my college education.

I thank you once again for helping me and my God already blessed you.

Thanks.
Erneste.

Dear Erneste,

Thank you for your beautiful note.

YOU ARE THE FUTURE.

I hope that as you grow up you realize that helping someone else is the greatest mission you can have.

God bless you,

Ray Tye

BIG IS BETTER

Re-Percussions...

Size matters. Just ask anyone at Big Night, the annual blowout of epic proportions to benefit the Big Brothers Big Sisters Association, held at the Convention Center.

To begin with, there's the fact that everyone goes all out with costumes, in this case, dressing like their favorite rock star. Then there's the food, prepared by celebrity chefs Ming Tsai, Michael Schlow, Joanne Chang, and Seth and Angela Raynor. Finally, there's always arena-worthy entertainment, which this year included Joey Kramer serving as an opening act of sorts (on a set of drums up for auction, but we'll get to that) for the reunited J. Geils Band, the greatest party band of all time (especially if you went to high school in the '80s).

Unrecognizable in his Cher getup was the tall and ballsy Marty Mannion, who took the stage with the equally unrecognizable John Dolan for the first of the evening's surprises. Their fellow gazillionaire cohort Robert "Tish" Tishman made a bet last summer that if he didn't drop 20 pounds by the end of January he'd pay Big Brothers $50K, but for every pound over 20, his friends would have to pony up $10,000. He's now 50 pounds lighter, and his friends are out a cool quarter of a mil. But hey, it's for a good cause.

All the usual suspects were there, including the ABBA-tastic banking scion Charlie Gifford and his beautiful blonde wife, Betsy, do-gooder Kelly Glew (Amy Winehouse) and her Elvis (Costello) husband, Mike, Prince of Fing Darkness Chip Pierce with PR princesses Wendy (his wife) and Kate Shamon (Axl Rose), her husband, Andy Rushford (Slash), dead-on Amy Winehouse doppelgänger Jill Purpura, numerous Ladies Gaga, gangs of KISS lookalikes (including Courtney and Michael Forrester), Colette Phillips channeling Diana Ross, and pretty much everyone with a nine-digit net worth within a hundred miles.

Overheard: Joey Kramer joking, "How do you like my costume?"

However, the evening's most entertaining incident took place when Kramer's drums were auctioned off, going to hedge-fund henchman Peter Monaco for $30,000. The funny part? He wouldn't know a high hat from a snare drum.

Going Commando...

"Bagpipes?!?" said one bewildered guest, arriving at the State Street Pavilion at Fenway Park for a super-glittery fundraiser for the Max Warburg Courage Curriculum. "Warburg isn't a Scottish name."

Wally and Suky Forbes Bigham at the Max Warburg Courage Curriculum

Forbes, however, is, and the evening was co-chaired by the super-sparkly Michael Bigham and Sukey Forbes Bigham, along with Eric and Mary Johnson. Besides arranging for a bagpipe player, they attracted a crowd of A-listers that included the über-groovy Jamie and Alison Forbes and Laura and Alex Saltonstall, grande dames Joan Kennedy, Ann Gund, Pam Humphrey and Diana Rockefeller, Beaver Country Day seniors Henry Moorhead and Hayley Yudelman, the improbably tall Arthur Winn with the improbably beautiful Alicia, babe-a-licious bluebloods Sally Fay Cottingham, Donna Storer and Katie Bleakie, Back Bay party pair George and Leigh Denny, and so on throughout the Social Register, Who's Who and the phonebooks of the better zip codes.

Overheard by the bar, courtesy of a working mother of two: "Whenever my husband mentions it, I say, 'If you have time for Facebook, honey, I need a foot massage and some laundry done.'"

However, the evening's funniest comment came from someone who got a glimpse of a very prominent 70-something lady settling herself onto a stool and said, "I just saw something I never thought I'd see and never want to see again. And somebody should tell her to wear panties."

For Better or Worse...

It was quite the high-octane crowd that collected at the Boston Harbor Hotel at the book party to celebrate Robert Lyons' latest, On Any Given Sunday: A Life of Bert Bell.

Among the bold-faced names in the room: the NFL commissioner's broadcasting legend of a son, Upton Bell, fishmonger Roger Berkowitz, Philanthroposaurus rex David Mugar, NBA legend Tommy Heinsohn, NFL great Randy Vataha, ruby-throated music man Ron Della Chiesa, Judge Hiller Zobel, BU prof Leslie Epstein (whose son does something for the Red Sox), political cartoonist nonpareil Paul Szep, son of a Speaker man Tom O'Neill, bestselling author Bill Martin, publishing poobah Nader Darehshori, the hotel's GM, Paul Jacques, and two of the most amusingly named women in this or any other city: Dusty Rhodes and Smoki Bacon.

Overheard by the bar, uttered by a woman of a certain age: "I don't think there's a point in any marriage where you don't want a divorce." Then she turned to her husband of 30 years and said, "Isn't that right, darling?" ***

That's Tight

I've come a long way since expressing a fear of skinny jeans in this space. I now wear jeggings, and jeggings make my skinny jeans feel like Hammer pants. The clothing equivalent of sausage casings, they have to be peeled off. But they fit perfectly inside boots, and thus work wonders for moms commuting on wet winter days. In a triumph of form and function, they keep me stylish and my legs dry.

Faced with fads, I pick styles that fit my life, which means embracing the trench and shunning short shorts. In this issue, you'll find those spring trends, along with five others whose overriding theme is wearability. You don't have to resemble Gisele to mix patterns. Even easier, bright colors have little risk of causing a fashion crime.... Although bright jeggings sound potentially problematic. My simple rule: Tight looks best in black.

KNOTTY AND NICE

DEBI GREENBERG, owner of Louis Boston, wanted to give her 85-year-old shopping institution a makeover appropriate for the changing times. "The [Back Bay] building we were in was beautiful but of a different generation," Greenberg explains of the move to Fan Pier. "People want to go into an atmosphere that's a respite from the world around them." Currently in a temporary location at One Marina Park Drive, Louis' new space come April is more modern beach house than department store—22,000 square feet of steel and glass with floor-to-ceiling views of the water. "The [scenery] takes my breath away," Greenberg gushes. The ICA and Menton should also make good neighbors.

Scup's in the Harbour owners Wendy Saver and David Rockwell regularly host a Sunday crowd playing hooky from church. The pair tempt these wayward souls with indulgent brunch items like brioche French toast (not to mention free parking and a waterfront view.) But it's the Rapture—scrambled eggs flaked with potato chips, spiced tomato jam and baby arugula on buttery toast—that offers the best reason to skip service, especially with the divine cherry wood–smoked bacon. ELIZABETH BOMZE bandage dress (n.): 1. a form-fitting evening dress; 2. a method of asphyxiation banned by the Geneva Convention.

A FASHION ILLITERATE'S GLOSSARY

FOR EVERY MAN WHO DOESN'T KNOW HIS HALSTON FROM HIS FLUEVOG, WE PRESENT THIS LIST OF COMMON TERMS, EXPLAINED.

clog (n.): a shoe worn by women who want to look like small Dutch boys.

cut-out (n., adj.): purposefully mutilated clothing, meant to convey wealth and/or congenital idiocy.

flannel suit (n.): a portable sweat lodge.

graffiti pants (n.): a garment that's been vomited on by a radioactive elephant.

island platform shoe → (n.): a shoe in which a portion of the sole is immoderately thickened (see also "femur, broken").

jegging (n.): the result of a union between a pair of Jordaches that got drunk at a Mötley Crüe concert circa 1985 and Nikki Sixx's spandex.

schoolgirl skirt (n.): a short, plaid skirt (see also "jailbait chic").

TO THE WOMAN WHO WROTE ABOUT THE NURSE SLEEPING WITH HER HUSBAND:
May I draw your attention to the fact that your HUSBAND is sleeping with someone in a CAR? And maybe he did stop, but only after he got busted. I'll spare you the psychobabble [about] your failure to fault your husband, most likely because you're scared that he'd leave you (and honey, if he's doing the nasty in a car with another woman, he's not so into you). This nurse might've made a bad decision, but she never took a vow of commitment and fidelity to you. He did. And the fact that he told you not to worry because it wasn't even a "good lay"? Classy! Congrats on winning back your cheating, smarmy husband. It sounds like you and Dr. Can't-Keep-It-in-His-Pants have a top-notch relationship based on trust and love. Women everywhere are so jealous. You're too good for him. He's gross, nasty and dishonest. AP

To the jilted wife:

After reading your impersonal, my sympathies are yours. You've been wronged. Yet while your frustration and anger are understandable, they're misplaced. Rather than using this well-read public forum to criticize an intelligent, caring and compassionate nurse who was caught up in an unfortunate romance, you might be better served by focusing your temper on the one most at fault. Impartial third party

To the young women on the Green Line:

I have a challenge for you: Take the word "like" out of your vocabulary and see if you can still manage to put a sentence together. [Too bad you can't] hear how uneducated and utterly ridiculous you sound when you say "like" every other word. Sadly, your fellow passengers have no choice but to listen to your babbling. Anonymous Perfection has its price.

Of course it tastes better than other beers. We've had over 600 years to get the recipe right. Our esteemed brewery has been producing beer in Leuven since 1366. Which means we've been around a bit longer than most. Mind you, over the years our beer has witnessed the odd change or two. For instance, our customers no longer drink it to ward off the Plague, as they used to in medieval times. However, one thing has stayed the same after all these years. Stella Artois is still painstakingly brewed in a time-honored tradition with the choicest ingredients. Which is why our customers have kept coming back for more, even after 600 years.

Always enjoy responsibly. stellaartois.com

New Kid on the Block

Beacon Hill often drowns in a sea of whale ties and boat shoes. Thankfully, Peter Tam crashed the preppy party. Tam, a former Tannery buyer, brought a bit of Barneys CO-OP to the Boston neighborhood with the opening of Uncle Pete's in December. At the shop, men will find shirts from Wolf vs. Goat and nylon hi-tops from Tretorn, plus harder-to-score brands like Rogues Gallery. The ladies might gravitate toward Vena Cava's silk dresses, or Cloak & Dagger's separates. The vibe is decidedly chill—all the way down to the comfy couch, fireplace and strewn-about books. Charles Street's uptight ship has sailed.

LEAH MENNIES

Going Way Out

Splitsville

Clio GM Christian Touche and Uni chef Chris Chung are taking their show on the road. Like their old home in the Eliot Hotel, their new restaurant in Lincoln will feature two different cuisines under the same roof. Explains Touche, "It will be a little bit like we have Clio, but more casual and more fun."

Touche originally set out to help Chung find a place of his own, but after seeing the 2,000-square-foot space that has become Aka Bistro, they decided to join forces. The pair met with the building owners last May and found them equally enthusiastic. So much so that they wanted a plan and menu in 10 days.

Opening in late March, the 40-seat dining room will feature 20 percent sashimi and 80 percent French fare like steak frites and veal blanquette (entrées will cost about $18–$29). Luckily, Touche came equipped with family recipes for traditional Provençal-style cuisine. "I learned a lot from Christian's mom," Chung explains. "She had classic recipes from her grandmother."

At the sashimi bar, the ratio will be flipped (with plates from $7–$22), and Chung will present both traditional styles and innovative twists, like spicy tuna tataki with foie gras, cumin-cilantro vinaigrette and pickled radishes.

The two are careful to avoid the F-word, though. "I don't want fusion," Chung asserts. "With beef bourguignon, you won't see lemongrass or ginger.... You won't see foam on top of escargot. The sashimi will be the wild side of the restaurant."

NICK ALTSCHULLER

THE TWO ARE CAREFUL TO AVOID THE F-WORD. "I DON'T WANT FUSION."

Beauty

Training Day

Personal trainer Leandro Carvahlo is responsible for some of the hottest bodies on the planet. Carvahlo's worked at New York's Equinox for nine years and with Victoria's Secret models for seven, preparing them for a winged runway where every inch of skin matters. As creator of the Brazil Butt Lift workout, he's helped natives like Gisele Bündchen and Alessandra Ambrosio attain perfection and shed their baby weight fast.

And then there's me. I'm meeting with Carvahlo, who's in town to promote his class, for a 30-minute session. Honestly, I'm more nervous for the pain than for a client comparison. We target the usual suspects—tush, thighs and hips—and practice moves from his newly released DVD. To achieve definition without bulking up, we do specialized squats, lunges and touchdowns until I can't feel my legs (which happens after just 10 minutes). It's the quality of the exercise, not the quantity, that matters.

By the end, I'm sore—but that rewarding kind of sore that doubles overnight and makes it impossible to sit the next day. See what I mean this spring when the Brazil Butt Lift comes to Equinox, just in time for bikini season. AMANDA KNORR

Child's Play

It's an odd thing to say about a restaurant offering a drink rimmed with Pop Rocks, but the scene at the Friendly Toast is maturing, thanks in part to new bar manager and Northeastern senior William Yerxa. The spot's playful spirit won't change—"I want people to be comfortable ordering a pancake and a cocktail," Yerxa says—but with his additions, some kitsch will leave the kitchen.

Exemplifying the bar's original spirit is STRANGERS ON A TRAIN ($9), a mix of Jack, Kahlua, Red Bull and M&Ms. As Yerxa explains, people try it thinking, "'That's insane, I wonder what it tastes like?' But I also want cocktails that people know will taste great." THE SECRET AGENT ($9) represents the newer style. Under a Creamsicle rim of honey and sugar laced with grenadine and orange zest, there's a smooth mix of vanilla vodka, cherry puree and Dr. Pepper. The puree is dark and rich, creating a cocktail fit for an adult while still looking like something that would please a six-year-old.

TERROIR AND TECH

An "awesome" tasting station

NOT JUST ANOTHER liquor store, the new Boston Wine Exchange offers unexpected space to browse in the usually cramped Financial District. There's also a techy draw: an automated tasting station that serves samples of eight wines, while preserving the bottles with an inert gas called argon so they stay fresh for up to 30 days.

"It's mostly designed for restaurants," says manager Eamon Keating, who describes the WineStation as "awesome." Also awesome: the store's selection of about 500 wines, plus craft beers, mostly "focused on local offerings," as well as Belgian, German and English imports in its Devonshire Street venue.

CHECK IT OUT: The Pulse Cafe, a vegan restaurant, has opened in Somerville's Davis Square. Chef/owner Bob Bouley creates dishes like "mushroom calamari" with lemon-garlic aioli, Southern-peach barbecue seitan and French onion soup with mac-nut Gruyère. Dinner's served Tuesday through Saturday, with brunch starting later this month.

CHEF/OWNER CHRIS PARSONS reports that Catch will relocate to Boston or Cambridge; the Winchester spot is slated to open as Parsons Table by month's end. The new restaurant features—all together now—comfort food from locally sourced ingredients.

GOOD NEWS FOR chocolate lovers: Lee Napoli is bringing back Chocolee, complete with weekend beignets. Still in the South End, the store's new location—formerly Haley House Bakery on Dartmouth Street—is set to open on March 18.

A DARK MYSTERY

The shadowlands of a mother's life and death

THE EQUANIMITY AND curiosity that Nancy Rappaport applies to her subject is admirable, given that she's exploring her mother's suicide. Her mom (also Nancy) was the vibrant yet unstable mother of six who ran for school committee, wrote a novel, had an affair with a married man, then married someone else. Meanwhile, husband Jerry, a prominent Boston developer, married the wife of his wife's lover and won custody of his children, creating an upper-middle-class, blended family that burgeoned to 11 kids. Mother Nancy wrote in a heart-squeezing style full of intense, almost adolescent yearning that showed sensitivity to her children despite spouse-exchanging, suicide attempts and the ugly polarization of a very public divorce. Alas, she abandoned her children while also (that old paradox) fighting to get them back. In her book, daughter Nancy, a child psychiatrist, unspools lifelong wonderings about her mom's tragic demise, a loss that has helped in her work with depressed teenagers. She also talks to her father, dazed and burdened by the gigantic sorrow and responsibility that death entailed, and to her stepmother. The family's viewpoints and memories sprawl out in many directions, tinged with the lifelong aftermath of suicide. ✖✖✖

Nick and Choose { NICK ALTSCHULLER }

TIMBRE!

Nick sounds off.

IT'S NATURAL TO LIE to yourself about your looks. My thinning hair makes me seem distinguished. See? It's easy. And necessary. If every glance in the mirror coincided with a moment of honest self-awareness, the world would unfurl into chaos.

Your voice is a different story. It's a trait you can hide from—until a phone message or home video shatters whatever auditory illusion you created. I wish I spoke like Donald Sutherland, but truthfully, I sound like I'm making Jell-O molds of my sinuses. Good thing I'm so handsome.

Speaking of delusions, I also believe in easy money and luck. Because of the former, I signed up for "Getting Paid to Talk: An Intro to Professional Voice-Overs" at Tufts' Osher Lifelong Learning Institute (there's another class on March 31). Due to the latter, on the same day I enrolled, I met Tom Dunn in a bar.

You may not recognize the name, but if you grew up around here, you know the voice. As our conversation turned to our professions, in lieu of a direct explanation, Dunn leaned over and whispered, "Promotional consideration for Sesame Street has been provided by." For a second, I could feel myself in footy pajamas. "Whenever I say that to people your age, their stomach drops," he explained.

For years, Dunn was the voice of Channel 2. Working with WGBH-TV, he often filled in for Robert J. Lurtsema, who, for the adolescent me, might as well have been the voice of the Almighty. Meeting Dunn was a sign, so I prodded him for guidance. "See a shrink and stay calm," he answered. (Perhaps I'm only hoping he was still referring to voiceovers.) He also recommended I practice by reciting ad copy, as it's often well-written and direct. When the day arrived for my lesson, I walked to campus repeating something about the quality of Absolut vodka, mindful of Dunn's advice to learn where my voice might fit in the field.

While he offered staid leadership, instructor John Gallogly was all vigor and exuberance. Gallogly is the creative director of Voice Coaches—what he intimidatingly described as "the Harvard of Voice Acting"—and with his buzzed head, jeans and untucked shirt, he looked like a bouncer in a tweed jacket. (Appropriate, as he had just taped a cage fighting commercial earlier that day.) I wasn't sure what to make of him at first, but after I learned Dan Castellaneta vouched for his program, I relaxed. Homer Simpson's stamp of approval is all I need.

We spent most of the class breaking down the money in the industry—$11.7 billion was spent in the voice-acting business last year, a 7.5 percent increase from 2008. A lot of that cash is doled out in four- to five-figure increments to professionals doing about 20 minutes worth of labor. Nice work if you can get it.

But could I? Audibly, I don't think I could sell anything. It's hard for me to express excitement without the benefit of an exclamation point. Thankfully, commercials are only 10 percent of the business. The rest is narration, in the form of products like instructional tapes, public address announcements or video games. I couldn't sell you a car, but maybe I could play an irritating citizen/shotgun fodder in the next Grand Theft Auto. Gallogly saw this latent talent. As I walked to the mike to record an ad for our voice test, he said, "I want you to be sarcastic. I have a feeling you can do that."

Apparently quite well, at least according to Jenny Marcotte, Gallogly's studio director. While currently figuring out whether Matt Damon or Jeff Bridges is going to narrate her next project, she took the time to evaluate my voice. Seems my vocal tone was made for humor and sarcasm, "but not upscale sophistication or sensuality—or children's books." So sleepy slacker, yes; sexy with kids, no. I can live with that.

Surprisingly, Marcotte suggested work in audio books. Such a heavy dose of my voice could probably double as a sleep aid, but 700 words at a time sounds about right. Maybe the role I was born to play is me. Then again, "Nick & Choose" as read by Donald Sutherland would blow your mind. ✖✖✖

Good Trends Gone Bad

GETTING INTO A JAM

Pajama style has its place. A hint of lacy underthings looks sexy, and I've seriously considered splurging on Alexander Wang's sweat shorts. But somewhere between Snuggies and jeggings, things have gone awry. To my horror, pajamajeans.com exists. The infomercial boasts: "They're amazingly comfortable, but let you look put-together all day long." The former may be true, but that doesn't make it right—a notion you should remember if you're tempted by this trend.

PIG OUT

Coppa delivers with small plates and plenty of pork.

TWO OF A KIND Crostini and bruschetta offer Tony Maws a respite from the Bissonnette-led pork fest.

SOME BONDS CAN'T BE broken. For chefs Tony Maws, Ken Oringer and Jamie Bissonnette, it's a brotherhood of pork. The union stems from a collective history: Bissonnette and Maws both worked with Oringer at his French-Asian flagship, Clio. Since then, Bissonnette and Oringer have teamed to open Coppa, not far from their original collaboration, Toro, in the South End. On the other side of the river, Maws stays rooted in his own restaurant, Craigie on Main. Since all three are unapologetic pork dorks, I asked Maws to join me at Coppa to sample the duo's swine-heavy salumi, pastas and pizzas.

As we nestled into the packed, 40-seat spot, Maws leaned back in his chair and studied the room. "This place has a great recipe," he noted of the neighborhood enoteca and its shareable plates. "Small space, great food. A perfect recipe, in fact." Faced with deciding what to try first on the reasonably priced menu, Maws said, "People seem to think I'm OK with pig tails and octopus."

Tony's picks

Raw pancetta

Mostarda-glazed pig tail

Calf's brain ravioli

He frequently showcases both in his own cooking, so as we sipped a velvety Chinato Fizz ($8), I had to ask: "Are you?"

"There are a lot of pigs running around without tails," he deadpanned. But while Maws is known for his way with meat, these days he's more excited about fish. By moving Craigie from a tiny basement near Harvard to a roomier Central Square location in 2008, he bought himself the elbow room to butcher more whole fish and to offer new variety.

Appropriately then, we started with crudo ($9 each): paper-thin slices of tuna with onion vinaigrette and slivers of fluke topped with bits of grapefruit. Both had a touch of sweetness that paired well with the sparkling Lamberti pinot nero ($10).

Maws moved us on to the charcuterie, which includes coppa, Bissonnette's favorite Italian salumi. The chef delivered a selection of cured meats ($5 each) to the table on a swine-shaped cutting board, explaining that many came from the same pig. Each folded pile was placed on the porker's corresponding part—an ear terrine sat near the head, raw pancetta rimmed the belly, and so on. Maws smiled in appreciation, as he also has an affinity for nose-to-tail presentations. "These are really well done," he said between mouthfuls, adding, "I love the belly."

Wood-roasted meatballs arrived next, each tender and well-seasoned with a melting sheet of thinly sliced lardo on top ($5). We then took a break from the meatfest for two styles of stuzzi ($5 each): a bruschetta with white beans and sage, and a crostini smeared with buttery chicken liver. Meanwhile, Maws was on the lookout for vino. "Something red, big, no new oak. And funky," he told our server. Wine director Courtney Bissonnette (Jamie's wife) obliged with a bottle of 2003 Il Falcone ($55), which hit all of his requests perfectly.

As we worked our way through two octopus dishes—one braised and served over a bed of garbanzo beans ($11), the other wood-roasted with salsa verde and preserved lemon ($9)—Maws noted the creative similarity between some dishes at Coppa and ones he cooked at Clio. "Ken taught me about not sticking to guidelines, to think outside the box," he explained. Now 40, Maws manages his own team, calling himself the quarterback of the kitchen. "I have my 20-month-old son, and I'm a parent to 12 other kids, too. It's been really cool."

To Maws' delight, our hog journey continued with a sweet-and-salty mostarda-glazed pig tail ($11) and trippa alla Romana ($11), an oozy dish of tripe baked with squash and mozzarella. From there, we tried a parade of pastas ($12 each), including silken calf's brain ravioli and spaghetti alla carbonara laced with a captivating combo of sea urchin, egg and pancetta.

Having combed almost the entire menu, we decided to cap the evening with a pizza ($15): half pepe bianco (white clams with bacon and onion), half blood-sausage pepperoni. It was a noble effort, but most of the slices ended up in a take-out box. Waddling through the empty restaurant, we stopped to chat with a cook who asked, "Just how full are you?"

Maws puffed out his cheeks. "Just a couple of stuffed pigs," he said. ✖✖✖

OLYMPIC HYPE

Somebody pass the remote.

DO YOU HAVE A PARTICULAR number that you use when you want to exaggerate? Mine is 19. For instance, if I've made the awful decision to stand in the self-checkout line at the grocery store, I might say, "This was a bad idea, but the other lines all had 19 people in them." Or, "Answer your damn phone—I tried calling you 19 times." Or, "I'm not pulling over again, because you've already taken 19 leaks." It's a number with a satisfying heft to it. And, as I write this, there are actually 19 photos of Shaun White on the cover of ESPN The Magazine.

White's undoubtedly a great snowboarder, but he's not what you'd call a conventionally handsome man. He looks like what would happen if Carrot Top did a Proactiv commercial and needed a "before" photo. But there's "hot," and then there's "Olympics hot"—and during the Winter Olympics, anyone who might win a medal is positioned as a sex symbol by advertisers and the media. If you're a female snowboarder with a blonde dye job and eyeballs that generally point in the same direction, you probably have a six-figure Revlon contract.

Hotness inflation is just one of the reasons I'm glad to bid farewell to the Winter Olympics. The constant hype wears me down. At the beginning of this year's games, The Globe ran a headline that breathlessly declared, "Vonn has U.S. in suspense"—a reference to skier Lindsey Vonn's bruised shin and its potential impact on her Olympic participation. I don't know about you, but when I heard about Lindsey Vonn's shin bruise, I didn't sleep for weeks. You know why unemployment is so high? Because people got fired for spending all day at work Googling "Lindsay Vonn shin bruise UPDATE." It was a pretty scary prospect: If Vonn hadn't competed, she wouldn't have won gold. And if America isn't the best at women's downhill skiing, that tells the rest of the world we're weak, and then it's only a matter of time before it's raining Chinese paratroopers over San Francisco. So The Globe was right on: suspense everywhere.

The Summer Olympics elicit the same sort of hype, but at least those games include events that normal people have actually attempted at some point in their lives. Therefore, you can be pretty sure that the medalists at the Summer Games are truly the best in the world at their chosen sports. I've tried running, and I know I'm no Usain Bolt. I've played soccer, and I'm quite certain I wouldn't make the Argentinian national team. But luge? I might be the best luger in the world. Who knows? I've never tried it.

And neither have most people. Michael Phelps is undoubtedly the best ganja-puffing swimmer in the world, but the best luger is probably tilling a field in Bolivia or sitting in a cubicle in Akron, Ohio. Meanwhile, the gold-medalist luger is the fastest dude who happened to grow up next to a luge track. Look, if I lived next to Water Country, you can bet I'd own the fastest time down the Double Geronimo. But so what?

Downhill skiing is probably the most mainstream winter event, and even that's a relatively obscure pursuit for the majority of the planet. I grew up in Maine, and it wasn't until college that I learned to ski—some people would argue that I still haven't—because my parents were hippies and preferred sports like compost-piling and pig-raising. Ultimate skiing ability is a function of growing up near a mountain and having parents willing to underwrite the lift tickets, training and ridiculous plastic boots necessary to make it to the top. As with luge, it's entirely possible that the most talented downhill skier in the world lives in Florida and has never seen a snowflake. That bastard.

The Winter Olympics are fun, and it's a good excuse for Uzbekistan to get out of the house, but the next time around I wish media coverage would lighten up a bit. The fate of nations doesn't hang in the balance of team speed-skating. Nor biathlon. Curling: maybe, for Canadians. You don't joke about curling with Canadians, unless you want a sternly worded rebuke followed by a soft apology for the outburst.

As for me, I'm going to put my money where my mouth is. I bet that if I buy some cross-country skis and a rifle, I can be an Olympic athlete by 2014. I'll also cultivate a dramatic storyline, like how I learned to ski with a gun after a yeti ate my twin brother. But then I'll get a rash on my trigger finger right before the games begin. And you'll be in suspense. Right up until a new episode of American Idol comes on. ✖✖✖

OUTDATED 'TEK

But the old warhorse isn't going away.

WHEN I THINK OF Jason Varitek, I like to think of the 2008 American League Championship Series against the Tampa Bay Rays. The Red Sox captain, mired in another one of his horrific slumps, saved the season by airlifting a ball over the centerfield fence in Game 6. That should've been the last image Red Sox Nation had of its captain: a winner, going out on top.

But storybook endings rarely happen in real life. The Red Sox won Game 6 in dramatic fashion but eventually lost Game 7. Then we saw Varitek evolve from a player everybody wanted at the plate in a game-changing moment to a guy who can't hit a baseball at the major league level. This isn't easy to write. There's no question that without Varitek's captaincy of the Red Sox ship in 2004 and 2007, we might still be whining about "the Curse." He's arguably been the best manager of a pitching staff to ever wear the Red Sox uniform. Carlton Fisk was good. But Varitek was great. His game preparation was second to none. The fact that he caught four no-hitters was no coincidence. He was, and probably still is, serious about his craft.

But when it comes to non-pitchers, baseball has two basic components. Defense is one. Offense is the other. Varitek has a big problem with the second part.

Last season the Red Sox did the right thing and traded for catcher Victor Martinez. VMart not only gave the Red Sox more pop out of the position, but he's a bona-fide power hitter. As a result, Varitek's career in Boston has taken a radical turn. This was obvious during the playoffs when manager Terry Francona, who's so respectful of veterans, mixed and matched in a vain effort to hand Varitek every opportunity to help the team win. The Angels beat the Sox in three straight games. There was no place for Varitek to hide in the struggling lineup.

Varitek will have to rely on class and dignity to get him through.

'Tek's time had come, and it was sad to see. Now with spring training officially open, he's facing the same questions that plagued him in the playoffs. "I got used to what it's like playing a backup role last year," he said. Any athlete who makes the transition from star player to benchwarmer (and eventually retiree) goes through a difficult time.

Even though his role with the team has changed on the field, Varitek stays focused and prepares just as if he were still getting ready to catch 150 games in the coming season. He reported into spring training in terrific shape, with the same hard-nosed attitude that makes Varitek... well, Varitek. And he still has the "C" on his jersey, a letter that eventually will go, I surmise, to Dustin Pedroia.

Varitek will have to rely on class and dignity to get him through these difficult months. It might not be so tough, since he's still a figure of tremendous respect in the clubhouse. "Jason is one of the classiest baseball players I've ever had as a teammate," Curt Schilling said last year. "Nobody is as prepared as he is.... Trust me, his teammates know how important he is to have around, no matter what his batting average is."

I wish I could say the same thing. I wish I could accept watching him in a backup role, but it's going to take some getting used to. Maybe he's going to surprise us. Maybe he's got a few extra base hits hiding in his arsenal. Maybe he'll be a great backup catcher.

Let's hope so. ×××

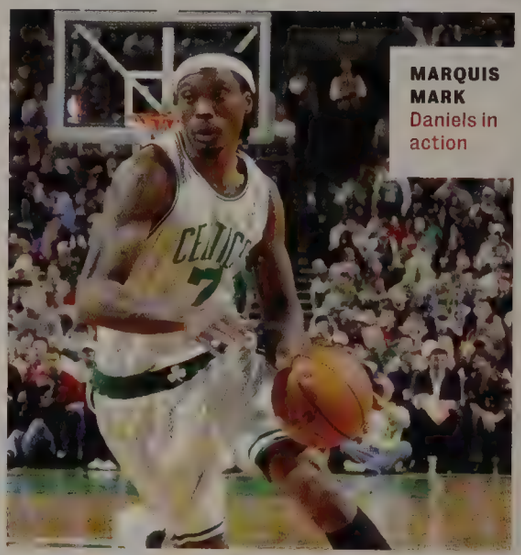
ON VINCE, PAPI, MOSI AND MARTINEZ

3 Random Thoughts

Huh? Qué? Having heard both men speak, I'm not sure how Victor Martinez and Dice-K will be able to communicate on the mound this year. No disrespect, but it's a legitimate question. Most of the time, they can probably get by on basics, but if it's late in a one-run game, it might be cool to have a conversation.

Gold Standard I love how little crying there was among NHL fans over the possibility of their stars getting hurt in the Olympics. In the NBA, fans freak out over a guy playing 15 minutes of pickup, yet these dudes engage in two weeks of off-the-charts intense competition, and everyone just soaks it in. Nice work, hockey.



Eddie, Out Looking back at Eddie House's two-plus years in Boston, nothing stands out more than his performance in Game 7 of the '08 Conference Finals. He'd spent the whole postseason watching as Doc, under some alien trance, gave Sam Cassell the second-unit minutes. But Eddie never said a word. And when his time came, he stepped up and ignited a C's victory (Paul Pierce helped a little, too).

1 ONE TRIBUTE TO MOSI TATUPU

Great guy. Great competitor. Great Patriot. Until I was six years old, he was the only Pats player I knew by name. Sure, some of that was because of its uniqueness, but Tatupu's cult status in New England went far beyond that. He'll be missed.

5 GUYS MAKING HEADLINES

Vinny Franchise Call me crazy, but I expected more fireworks after the Pats slapped Vince Wilfork with the franchise tag. I thought maybe he'd throw a tantrum, fire some shots at Belichick, go on a bender with Adalius Thomas. But no, all we got were a few tweets from his wife! This can only mean one thing: A long-term contract is on the way. Good. The man deserves a deal.

MARQUIS MARK Daniels in action

Word Aapp I wanted to hate the Nate Robinson trade—mostly because I thought I was supposed to hate Robinson. In reality, he provides so much of what the team needs: instant offense, energy, charisma. Sure, there'll be some bumps along the way, but you'll be too busy bitching about Rasheed to worry.

Papi Lite Not to steal (yet again) from Chris Rock's "I take care of MY kids" bit, but are we seriously going to applaud David Ortiz for showing up to spring training in shape? I mean, yeah, it's great that he was motivated enough to get his ass in gear (ahem, contract year!), but know what would've also been great? If he hadn't shown up in 2009 looking like the catcher on a 40-and-over softball team.

Not Easy Being Quisy I touched on this subject last issue, but recent events only hammered the point home: Other than KG's health, Marquis Daniels is the single biggest X-factor in the Celtics' championship hopes. He's a guy that makes the difference between a good team (see: Celtics, 2009) and a great team (see: Celtics, 2008). Now that the awful "Hey, let's make him a point guard!" experiment has gone the way of Lester Hudson, Quis can finally get down to business.

Free Your Mind I don't mind anything Randy Moss said during last month's "the Patriots don't pay" interview. He wasn't taking cheap shots or spitting out BS clichés. He was merely giving an honest answer, and that's unbelievably refreshing. Now, if he starts talking like that during the season, then maybe there's a problem. But hey, that's why they brought in... David Patten?

2 MULLIGANS

Whoops A couple of issues ago, I proclaimed the Bruins dead. I thought they'd hit too much hardship and were ready to fold. Proof once again of how little I know about hockey. Not only are the Bruins finally healthy, but they've also got some momentum—at least enough to hold on to one of the final playoff spots. Although, with my track record, maybe I should just shut up.

Seeing Double Last summer, I predicted that Ramon Ramirez would break the Red Sox single-season record for appearances. He missed by 11, but it doesn't matter. What I meant to say was, "In 2010, the two Ramon Ramirezes will combine to break the single-season appearance record." Thank you.

4 DATES TO WATCH

3/3 It's the spring training opener, as the Sox split for games against Northeastern and BC. Sadly, in both cases, they'll have the inferior lineup.

3/5 NFL free agency gets going, and with the uncapped year set in motion, I'd like to take this time to offer my place-holding skills to any and all takers. Seriously, I'm like a young Lee Johnson.

3/7 The Bruins hit the national stage for a Sunday matinee against the Penguins. Although, I think NBC can come up with a better name than "Hockey Afternoon in Pittsburgh."

3/14 The C's take on the Cavs at Quicken Loans Arena, where the Green have lost 11 of their last 12 games. But on the bright side, at least we don't live in Cleveland.

"People have a cynical idea of how cynical

Soroff On DAVID WADE

The Emmy-winning news anchor reports on objectivity in the media, his divorce and how to say "Boehner."

RAISED IN SOMERVILLE AND IN TEWKSBURY, WBZ-TV Channel 4's David Wade co-anchors the weekday newscasts at 5 am, 6 am and noon. After earning a degree in broadcast journalism from Emerson College, Wade, 36, began his career as a reporter at WRNN-TV in Rye Brook, N.Y., moved to the Fox affiliate in Albany and landed at Boston's Fox 25 in 1998. He has been nominated for 20 regional Emmy awards and has won 17, including three for best anchor, as well as an Associated Press award in 2002. Divorced from WCVB-TV Channel 5 anchor Bianca de la Garza, with whom he has a four-year-old daughter, Wade lives in Newton.

Jonathan Soroff: Do you think the media get a bad rap?

David Wade: I do. When we get something wrong, like the weather forecast, so many people think we do it on purpose. I'm amazed that they think we're that conniving.

Like the conspiracy between meteorologists and the people who sell milk and batteries...
[Laughs.] I think people have a cynical idea of how cynical we are. They think we're taking the news and adjusting it the way we want. Although I admit that there are times when we inadvertently end up adding to the hype, like the weather stories. I often find myself thinking, "Well, this is New England. It snows. So what?"

Do you like being the person who directly follows The Price Is Right*?*
I've had a few proud moments in my life, and one of them is the fact that the last words before we go on at noon are "spayed and neutered."

The makeup. Do you hate it?
Washing it off is the first thing I do. I think only hookers wear that much makeup at 4 am. It's me, and a smattering of people in the Combat Zone.

Do people in the supermarket stop you and expect a full update on the news?
They do. And I like that. It makes me feel part of the community. The only thing that embarrasses me is when I don't know what they're talking about. They're like, "What's the deal out in Kansas City?" And I'm like, "Oh, yeah! That's a crazy one!" But it's amazing how much you learn by osmosis just being in the newsroom.

Where do you keep your Emmys?
I took two of them and melted them down into a chalice that I only use at hip-hop parties.

Ever get emotionally involved in a story?
After the earthquake in Haiti, when they first found out that college student Britney Gengel from Rutland had been found, we got a false report that she was alive. I was absolutely elated, and we had her father on TV, beaming, doing a live interview for seven minutes. It was the most touching thing I've ever seen. Then it turned out that they had bad information, and it was emotionally touching for the exact opposite reason.

Biggest on-air faux pas?
I haven't sworn yet, which is pretty amazing. Once at Fox, my body decided to have an on-air convulsion and just wouldn't let me say "archaeologist." I sounded like Porky Pig going, "arky-arky-arky," until the floor director finally said it for me, and I spit it out.

Is there a word that always trips you up?
Congressman John Boehner (pronounced Bayner), and twice on the air I've said "Boner."

How important is your hair?
On a scale of 1 to 10, probably a 14. [Laughs.] I just hope I can keep some of it.

You have the advantage of being local and knowing the pronunciations of town names.
It's a bigger advantage than you think. The first time you say Gloucester wrong, everyone jumps down your throat. Bostonians don't love outsiders.

Did you ever have a Boston accent?
The worst! I grew up in Somerville and then moved to Tewksbury. But I got rid of it at Emerson. I had a professor of voice and articulation who tortured me about it. To this day, certain words, like Martha's Vineyard, mess me up. If I see that coming, I'll try to get away with "a small island off the coast of Massachusetts."

Single piece of news you'd most like to deliver?
Osama bin Laden has been captured.

Do meteorologists deserve to be flung from the ramparts when they get it wrong?
They have the toughest job. They're predicting things in the future, while we just report what already happened.

Fox News—is it "fair and balanced"?
I can only say from the perspective of the local station, and I think we were. We certainly never went out of our way to present a particular point of view. That said, I was just watching the national network and noticed they spent about 30 minutes discussing how many seats the Republicans were going to win in the fall.

Do a lot of people get their news from sources like Nancy Grace or The Daily Show*?*
Yeah, and it scares the bejeezus out of me. In some online poll recently, Jon Stewart was voted the most trusted newsperson. He's a comedian! That's crazy. What does that say about me?

Who's the most trustworthy newsperson?
I'm a Tom Brokaw guy.

Are you and Bianca [de la Garza] the latter-day Chet and Natalie?
[Laughs.] I guess we did the same thing. Although I don't think either of us approach their iconic stature. But a lot of people were interested in our divorce, which surprised me.

Does it bother you?
No. I put myself on TV every single day. I certainly go on the news and report about people's personal lives all the time. So it would be very hypocritical for me to tell someone not to do the same.

Biggest failing of TV news?
That it's always on. Why not get all the facts together and put it out there at a specific time?

Strangest fan encounter?
There was a guy who used to call me after every newscast and say really inappropriate things that involved ropes and other things you buy at Home Depot. The other odd one, but it was strangely touching, was that right after I got divorced, I received a poem from a guy in prison about how life goes on, trying to give me good advice. ✖✖✖

BEAUTY AND THE FEAST

IT'S NOT EVERYONE who can find the transcendental meaning in oranges, honey pots and boxes of sweets. But Luis Meléndez was no ordinary observer. Considered the greatest still-life painter of 18th-century Spain, Meléndez had a passion for the new science of natural history. His sumptuous images of everyday objects celebrate the country's bountiful harvest. Probe their depths, or just get hungry, at an exhibit of his work at the Museum of Fine Arts through May 9.

The Show Must Go On

Imagine that you've been working all day on building a greenhouse, and at the last minute you're told to make it into an ice rink. Panicked frustration is the theme of the Boston Lyric Opera's production of Ariadne auf Naxos, telling the story of a producer who alters a show's script just before the curtain rises. There's hilarity, tears, hair pulling and, hopefully, a happy outcome. See it at the Citi Performing Arts Center March 12–23. Erin Wiegert

Avatar ★ ½ Twelve years and some $400 million later, James Cameron's latest opus lands with a thud. Sure, you can admire the 3-D presentation, performance-capture technique and computer animation. (If you're not already impressed enough, characters keep elbowing you in the ribs, a reminder that you're watching something amazing.) This is groundbreaking, next-level technology, and I was bored out of my damn mind. Looking like a tacky airbrush painting, Avatar is CGI eye candy by way of prog-rock album covers with an absence of characterization and an abundance of corny dialogue. Unabashedly ripping off Terrence Malick's The New World, Kevin Costner's Dances With Wolves and his own Aliens, Cameron sends Sam Worthington's crippled space marine to a distant planet to reenact a banal white-guy-saves-the-natives fantasy. It feels recycled, rehashed and more like an F/X demo reel than an actual movie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Blind Side ★ The inspirational true story of the Baltimore Ravens' Michael Oher becomes one of the year's most inadvertently offensive movies, thanks to Sandra Bullock's rampaging ego and the kind of unconscious racism Hollywood does better than anyone else. Oher, the troubled son of a crack addict, spent much of his childhood homeless before being adopted by a rich, white family who kindly helped him fulfill his potential. But instead of focusing on Oher's moving struggle, The Blind Side spends two hours inviting us to worship the selflessness of his new mom, played by Bullock as an amalgamation of Julia Roberts' least appealing qualities. She fires off sassy one-liners in endless glamour shots, while the rest of the cast nods approvingly and tells us how great she is. Oher, played by Quinton Aaron, is given no thoughts of his own. He just thanks her profusely and does what he's told. This isn't a movie about adopting a son; it's about adopting a pet. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Book of Eli ★ ½ Essentially The Road for Dummies, directors Allen and Albert Hughes' postapocalyptic slog stars Denzel Washington as a taciturn, almost supernaturally gifted protector of the last remaining copy of the King James Bible. Hacking and slashing off limbs to spread the word of God (which I think may be missing the point), Washington keeps the Good Book from falling into the hands of nasty folk like Gary Oldman's scenery-chewing whorehouse owner. Oldman's predictably hambone performance nods to Ian McShane's immortal work in Deadwood, and it's fascinating how much the Hughes Brothers slave to replicate sequences from other movies without coming up with an original idea of their own. There's more than a little Mad Max, with certain scenes stolen outright from Children of Men. As if the constant visual references to Sergio Leone's spaghetti Westerns weren't enough, one of the characters can't stop whistling Ennio Morricone music cues. There's nothing here you haven't seen done before, and done better. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

Crazy Heart ★★ ½ In his best performance since The Big Lebowski, Jeff Bridges stars as a washed-up, alcoholic country singer touring lousy Southwestern dive bars. Scott Cooper's debut feature initially boasts a grungy authenticity, but just when you think Crazy Heart is on its way to being The Wrestler of country music, a banal redemption formula kicks in and sends the whole film reeling off into inspirational TV-movie land. The too-young Maggie Gyllenhaal proves an improbable love interest for Bridges' seedy troubadour, and (an excellent) Colin Farrell drops by as a former protégé who makes success look far too easy. The grim, admirable desolation of the film's early passages is quickly abandoned for garden-variety uplift and clichéd rehab scenes. The late-game addition of Robert Duvall as a curmudgeonly AA aficionado only adds to the phoniness. These brave performances deserved better. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Dear John ★ ½ There's something queasy about bazillion-selling author Nicholas Sparks' concept of romance. Specializing in star-crossed lovers torn asunder before they're ever forced to get down to the messy business of learning to accept one another's imperfections, his is a juvenile and troubling formula. Usually Sparks just kills one of the characters off, as in A Walk to Remember, Message in a Bottle or Nights in

SHOCK THERAPY

Scorsese's latest stumbles but succeeds in the end.

Shutter Island ★★★ ½
Starring Leonardo DiCaprio, Mark Ruffalo, Ben Kingsley and Michelle Williams. Based on the book by Dennis Lehane. Screenplay by Laeta Kalogridis. Directed by Martin Scorsese. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

"I DON'T WANT TO BE A PRODUCT of my environment," snarls Jack Nicholson at the start of Martin Scorsese's 2006 Oscar-winner The Departed. "I want my environment to be a product of me."

The sentiment, which seemed like a non sequitur at the time, feels like a sick punch line to Shutter Island, Scorsese's follow-up to that commercial smash. Based on the bestselling novel by Dennis Lehane—one that I started and never bothered to finish—Scorsese's latest is an exercise in malevolent ambience that works marvelously, often in spite of the occasionally lame story it's trying to tell. This is a Technicolor

phantasmagoria seen almost exclusively through the point of view of its tormented, guilt-ridden antihero.

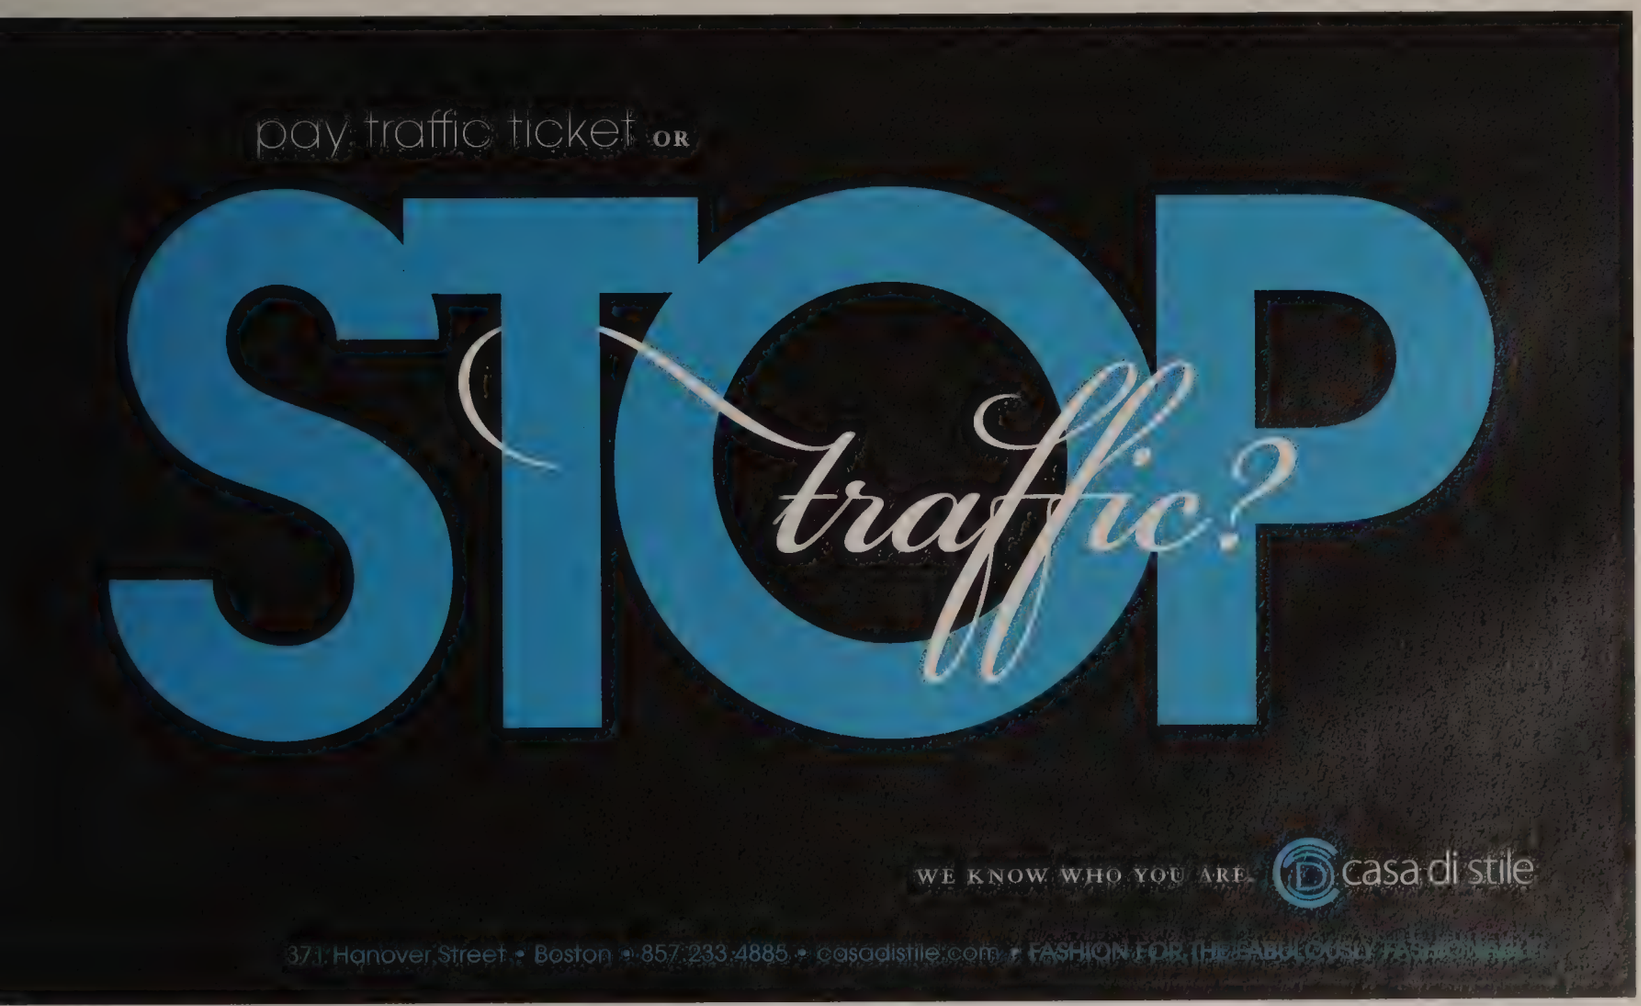
In his fourth Scorsese film, Leonardo DiCaprio plays thuggish federal marshal Teddy Daniels. Like Taxi Driver's Travis Bickle and Raging Bull's Jake LaMotta, his character is afforded no outside perspective. Our warped view of the events comes through his erratic, unreliable eyes. Scorsese's brilliance—if you'll recall that harrowing cocaine freak-out from Goodfellas—is to lock us into a character's mind and crank the screws. In Scorsese movies, the environment is always a product of the protagonist.

It's 1954, and Daniels is headed to a mental hospital for the criminally insane on a hyperbolically forbidding island in Boston Harbor. His job is to investigate a patient's abrupt disappearance in a place where rumors run rampant about barbaric mind-control experiments forced upon the inmates. The asylum used to be an old Civil War fort, and with a hurricane raging outside, Daniels and his loyal partner (a brilliant Mark Ruffalo) find themselves stranded in a web of red herrings, off-kilter monologues by special guest stars and deafening music cues.

Shutter Island is a showcase of style, a brilliant filmmaker flexing his muscles despite the material. Lehane's story chases its own tail down dead ends for far too long, waiting to rip the rug out from under the viewer with a gotcha ending. But Scorsese burrows deeper, telegraphing the "twist" in the opening moments and asking you to see the film as something scarier and more substantial than the novelist's simple trick. The earlier you figure out this "surprise" ending—and it's glaringly obvious—the more rewarding the movie becomes as a portrait of denial and self-hatred.

In other words, it's a real Martin Scorsese picture.

Troubling visuals abound. There's an oversoaked vividness to the film's colors thanks to legendary cinematographer Robert Richardson. The two best bits in this neon noir are prolonged dream sequences that eschew cinematic logic and veer off into horrifyingly illogical abstractions. (There are also Daniels' recurring nightmares about his service in WWII and liberating Dachau—surely the most lurid and expressionistic concentration camp footage we've ever seen.)



The Scorsese/DiCaprio love affair has taken on interesting angles lately; in both The Departed and Shutter Island, the filmmaker has turned his gifted protégé's liabilities into assets. Leo is 35 but looks a good 10 years younger. Scorsese preys upon that vulnerability, constantly undercutting his star's false swagger. DiCaprio talks a good game but is always the weakest, most defenseless person in these movies.

Lehane's story is still a problem though, and the script by James Cameron's uncredited Avatar collaborator Laeta Kalogridis doesn't help matters. The back end of Shutter Island is bogged down with unwieldy exposition. There are only so many crazy angles Scorsese can come up with for all the blah-blah-blah scenes before we stop paying attention. But at least we can admire all the effort he's putting into making us care.

In a movie drunk on sly references to Hitchcock's Spellbound and Vertigo, it's funny that the one Hitchcock scene Scorsese chooses to rip off wholesale is that loathsome, studio-mandated conclusion to Psycho. You know, when the psychiatrist walks in and boringly explains the movie you've just seen? (Here Ben Kingsley does the job, complete with charts on an easel!)

I'll confess, I'd almost checked out of Shutter Island by that point. But then a brief epilogue (which diverges from Lehane's book considerably) offers up a whole new realm of ambiguity and steers the film away from thriller and straight into tragedy. A final, wordless exchange between several characters is so loaded with consequence that it stomped on emotions I had no idea this movie had triggered in me.

The final shot stuck in my gut all the way home. ✖✖✖

Rodanthe. But Dear John is even more callous. During a couple of weeks on the beach, mumble-mouthed GI Channing Tatum falls hard for Amanda Seyfried's doe-eyed friend to autistic children and horses. Soon duty calls, and the two exchange awkward, handwritten correspondence for seven years (or about six years longer than it would've taken normal people to get over a summer fling). In this effort from formerly talented director Lasse Hallström, everything just lies there martyred and inert. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Edge of Darkness ★★★ It's been eight years since Mel Gibson last played a leading role, and despite whatever qualms you may have about his occasional drunken rants, there's still nobody better at acting furious onscreen. Gibson's comeback attempt is a hard-boiled, extremely grim Boston noir that allows Mel to do what he does best. He gets really angry and either shoots people or punches them in the face. Director Martin Campbell, condensing his six-hour BBC miniseries to feature-length, has a bit of trouble retrofitting all the sprawling plot lines into an abbreviated running time, but the gist of it remains. Very bad people killed Gibson's daughter. Now he's going to make them pay. Creepy, borderline psychotic and, to put it bluntly, not aging well, Gibson is a stout, angry bulldog with a laughable Roslindale

Barking Mad

Puppy Love Ever paid hefty grooming fees or bought organic puppy chow? Such is the price of a loyal, pedigreed companion. See the pampering in action on March 15 at Coolidge Corner Theatre in Christopher Guest's mockumentary Best in Show, a send-up of competitive canine culture that follows contestants vying for top honors at a prestigious dog show. Preceding the film, veterinary behaviorist Nicholas H. Dodman explains why man's best friend makes him act in extreme ways. Domenica Cerasaro accent. He's also wicked awesome. Campbell smartly plays upon the actor's diminished good looks, short stature and air of dissolution. Mel's back, but the years have not been kind. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

An Education ★★ ½ In what's sure to be Roman Polanski's favorite film of the year, dazzling newcomer Carey Mulligan stars as a 16-year-old schoolgirl who falls under the sway of Peter Sarsgaard's suave 30-something hepcat in gloomy, postwar Britain. Adapted by novelist Nick Hornby from Lynn Barber's memoir, the movie takes a tender look back at statutory rape as a rite of passage, and it's a testament to some fine performances that the film only feels icky in retrospect. There's nobody better than Hornby at dissecting all the ways people like to define themselves through their tastes and fascinations, but in nearly every other respect, his screenplay is too fussy and neat for its own good. This is a very polite, middlebrow view of what must've actually been an extremely messy affair. Director Lone Scherfig keeps everything humming pleasantly along, with even the inevitable betrayals and recriminations occurring at a genteel pitch. It's as if all the characters are afraid to raise their voices. The feel-good final reel is almost unforgivable. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Fantastic Mr. Fox ★★★ ½ Writer/director Wes Anderson's fastidious, sometimes suffocating, attention to costume detail and production design make his movies feel like they're taking place in dollhouses, so it makes sense that he would work with puppets. Rendered in hand-crafted, stop-motion animation, this marvelous adaptation of the Roald Dahl story may look like one of those Rankin-Bass holiday specials from the 1970s, but it still feels like a Wes Anderson film. It's got the filmmaker's dysfunctional family pathos and droll hipster humor, only with woodland animals instead of actors. George Clooney voices the title character, a reformed chicken-thief turned newspaper columnist itching to return to his criminal roots. His antics stoke the ire of three nasty farmers, and Mr. Fox and family find themselves on the run. Boasting bone-dry vocal turns from Meryl Streep, Jason Schwartzman and Bill Murray, the movie feels like a summation of Anderson's career thus far, with certain scenes lifted almost directly from The Royal Tenenbaums and The Life Aquatic With Steve Zissou. (In the suburbs.)

The Imaginarium of Dr. Parnassus ★★ Terry Gilliam can't catch a break. The 2002 documentary Lost in La Mancha chronicles The Man Who Killed Don Quixote, Gilliam's aborted project that fell victim to natural disasters, catastrophic health problems and general bad planning. Just when things were starting to look up, Gilliam took on The Imaginarium of Dr. Parnassus. First, star Heath Ledger passed away, then producer William Vince succumbed to cancer. During post-production, the director was hit by a car and broke his back. I wish I could report a triumph over impossible odds, but this film is an unholy mess. Christopher Plummer stars as an immortal, old-time street performer lugging a stage set across modern-day London, while gambling with the devil (Tom Waits) over how many souls he can save. Ledger turns up as a con man, with Johnny Depp, Colin Farrell and Jude Law filling his shoes every now and again. It's a stumbling, patchy movie that's interesting at moments but confounding in the end. (At Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

Invictus ★★★ For such a straightforward, often clumsy crowd-pleaser, Clint Eastwood's latest still feels like a marvel of restraint. Indeed, Invictus is an exercise in doing less with more. Recently elected Nelson Mandela (Morgan Freeman) seeks to reconcile a deeply divided South Africa by rallying the public behind their largely white rugby team, which had long been considered a symbol of institutionalized racism. Like Eastwood's Flags of Our Fathers, Invictus is about how cynical, insincere political calculations are often necessary to serve the greater good. Eastwood's not great at shooting sports, but he gets a sly, complicated performance out of Freeman, and there's some predictably fine, understated work from Matt Damon as the team captain. This should've been the hokiest movie ever made, but Eastwood plays it quietly and close to the vest. (In the suburbs.)

It's Complicated ★★★ There's such a lightness to Meryl Streep's work these days—even in something as wretched as Mamma Mia!—that she seems to be having the time of her life. Same goes for Alec Baldwin, whose middle-aged paunch has unleashed his inner comedian. Writer/director Nancy Meyers honestly doesn't have to do much besides put these dynamos together and let them riff. Playing a couple that's been divorced for a decade, Streep and Baldwin drunkenly hook up the night before their son's college graduation and spend the rest of the movie negotiating the horny aftershocks. Baldwin's remarried to a bitchy younger woman (Lake Bell, harshly photographed to give Streep the advantage) while Meryl finds herself in a tentative courtship with Steve Martin's sensitive architect. Like most Meyers movies, this one wallows uncomfortably in ostentatious displays of wealth. But there's no denying the giddy chemistry between Streep and Baldwin. They're both having so much fun it's contagious. (In the suburbs.)

Legion ★ ½ Holy crap. This theologically goofy rip-off of The Terminator stars Paul Bettany as the archangel Michael, who falls to Earth after God gets fed up with humanity and decides to throw a low-rent apocalypse. For reasons that are never explained, Adrianne Palicki's chain-smoking, trailer-trash waitress is eight-months pregnant with the savior of mankind. After loading up on ammo and sawing off his wings, our badass angel holes up in a desolate diner, disobeys his holy orders and shoots cretins in the head until the miracle kid is finally born. And, oh, what a wacky bunch of stereotypes we have in this joint! There's a rich guy, a black guy and even Dennis Quaid! Longtime special-effects guru Scott Stewart's directorial debut is a cheap-looking siege movie gussied up with vague religious affectations, which become all the more offensive because they never bother to make any sense. (In the suburbs.)

The Lovely Bones ★ ½ Peter Jackson, New Zealand's splatter-movie hero turned tedious golden boy, took on Alice Sebold's beloved novel and conceived the kind of film that only somebody convinced of their own genius could create. The Lovely Bones isn't just a lousy picture; it's bad on a legendary scale. The story of a child's rape and murder shouldn't produce such peals of laughter, but Jackson's gaudy representations of the afterlife, mawkish sentimentality and all-around tastelessness borders on camp. After young Susie (Saoirse Ronan) falls victim to Stanley Tucci's twitchy neighborhood pervert, the movie splays out in a hundred confounding directions, including a tacky CGI heaven full of New Age hokum. While the criminally miscast Mark Wahlberg wallows in grief over his daughter's murder, Susan Sarandon drops by for bad comic relief as the drunken grandma. Jackson keeps the emotional pitch of every scene cranked to 11, crushing the delicacy of Sebold's tale beneath elaborate trick-shots and juvenile, hyperbolic hysteria. (In the suburbs.)

Nine ★ Rob Marshall is back with a desultory take on Federico Fellini's 8 ½, and it's a travesty. Much like Marshall's pitifully unimaginative adaptation of Chicago, Nine is a musical for people who hate musicals, again confining the singing and dancing numbers to a black soundstage that exists only in the imagination—because God forbid anybody bursts into song in a musical. Fellini's playfully sad reverie has been adapted by Michael Tolkin and the late Anthony Minghella, two desperately serious screenwriters who make the fatal mistake of treating a comic predicament as the stuff of grand tragedy. Daniel Day-Lewis might be our greatest living actor, but he couldn't possibly be more wrong for this role, replacing Marcello Mastroianni's debauched delight with angst, hand-wringing and temper tantrums. He also seems about as Italian as a shepherd's pie. (In the suburbs.)

Sherlock Holmes ★★★ ½ Folks who grew up on the tweedy elegance of Basil Rathbone's 1940s B-movies might quibble with director Guy Ritchie's presentation of Sherlock Holmes (Robert Downey Jr.) as a loutish, bare-knuckle-brawling, manic-depressive. However, I found the film to be the most pleasant surprise I've had at the theater since Star Trek. It's a jaunty, very funny picture. So often in action movies brainpower is synonymous with weakness, but the script presents intelligence as just another form of bad-assery, with Holmes using his encyclopedic knowledge of human anatomy to overcome foes twice his size. Downey and Jude Law's Watson have the easy, bristling chemistry of an old married couple, and Sherlock's only problems arrive when the screenplay keeps them apart. (At Boston Common, Harvard Square and in the suburbs.)

The Twilight Saga: New Moon ★ And you thought the first one was terrible? This second installment of Stephenie Meyer's awful ode to sexual repression is so glum, dreary and snail-paced, it feels like it plays in slow-motion. Pining, as always, for sparkly vampire Edward Cullen (Robert Pattinson, still looking vaguely embarrassed to be here), Kristen Stewart's depressed Bella pouts, whines and stares off into space a lot. With Edward out of the picture for most of the running time, she tries to distract herself with the happy, shirtless visage of Taylor Lautner's Jacob. But Bella has rotten luck with boys, as every guy who takes a shine to her seems to end up being some sort of supernatural beast. Though his waxed chest might lead you to believe otherwise, Jacob is actually a werewolf, and so we suffer through more of Meyer's lame mythology and lots of annoying emo posturing. It takes an awfully long time for nothing to happen in New Moon. (In the suburbs.)

Up in the Air ★★★ ½ Director Jason Reitman's sturdy, crowd-pleasing adaptation of Walter Kirn's novel is best when it allows George Clooney to subtly toy with and deconstruct his tabloid persona. Clooney stars as a blissfully single corporate tool who spends 300 days a year flying from town to town, firing folks whenever their cowardly bosses need to outsource the axing. Streamlined, efficient and preaching a gospel of "no luggage," Clooney meets his match in Vera Farmiga's randy road warrior and finds himself forced to rethink his philosophy when Anna Kendrick's up-and-coming protégée threatens his way of life. It's slick, classy entertainment, more beholden to Billy Wilder than Judd Apatow. Reitman's occasional bouts of glibness are no match for Clooney's seemingly effortless, soul-searching work. The handsome bastard is able to suggest sudden, midlife bouts of yearning without making a big show of it. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Valentine's Day ★ Just as punishing and unpleasant, but somehow feeling even longer than the fake holiday after which it was named, Garry Marshall's omnibus of clichés plays out like a lowlight reel of the worst parts of every romantic comedy you've hated during the past few years. Inelegantly juggling dozens of characters and disparate plotlines among a massive cast of also-rans, it's a logjam of sitcom-contrived vignettes and go-nowhere anecdotes. A lobotomized Love Actually, Valentine's Day sputters and falters for over two hours, while folks like Ashton Kutcher, George Lopez and Jessica Biel do spit-takes and pratfalls and overact so maniacally, only the relaxed, phoned-in cameo from Julia Roberts kept me from poking my eyes out. It's a horribly made movie that takes the built-in audience for granted. A friend called it "Crash, but with flowers instead of racism." (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The White Ribbon ★★★ Michael Haneke, the harsh, professorial director behind Funny Games and Caché, loves to punish his audience. His latest, which won the Palme D'Or at last year's Cannes Film Festival, is no exception. Filmed in high-contrast black-and-white with Haneke's usual air of viciousness and lack of music, The White Ribbon tells the sad, elliptical tale of a small pre-WWI German town infected with casual sadism. There's something reminiscent of Village of the Damned in Haneke's presentation of the town's children, tormented by their vicious, dictatorial parents until animal abuse and casual acts of torture are practically inevitable. Like his other films, there's a dazzling command of formal cinematic technique in the service of a one-note thesis. Haneke's attempting to depict Nazism in prepubescent form. The White Ribbon is a bit too easy and pleased with itself but still impossible to shake. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

The Wolfman ★ ½ After years of reshoots and post-production, this remake of Universal's 1941 classic has the unresolved air of a movie endlessly fussed with. Eventually finished by Honey, I Shrunk the Kids director Joe Johnston, The Wolfman can't decide what it wants to be when it grows up. Benicio Del Toro stars as the cursed son of a batty patriarch (Anthony Hopkins, doing his hammy paycheck-gig routine.) It's a dour, oppressive movie, albeit shot quite beautifully in silky shadow by cinematographer Shelly Johnson. The Wolfman just needs to be much sillier or far more serious. Hopkins, as always, gobbles up every last bit of scenery, but Del Toro sadly plays all this nonsense straight. As a producer on the film, Del Toro mustn't have wanted to sabotage his surroundings with another bizarre performance, but underplaying is not his strong suit. The film feels like a wasted opportunity. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

DOWN TO EARTH

Singer/harpist Joanna Newsom blends accessibility and ambition.

Joanna Newsom plays Sanders Theatre on March 17.

Annabel Mehran

JOANNA NEWSOM LITERALLY had to find her voice on her ambitious new triple-CD Have One on Me. "I went in to record and tried to sing and couldn't," the indie-folk siren says. "It just sounded horrible and off and strange."

Ironically, some people used similar descriptions for Newsom's past work. Even her critically acclaimed but polarizing 2006 opus Ys (pronounced ees) drew dissenters who considered her lyrics dense and bookish, her vocals shrill and child-like.

Nodules on her strained vocal cords were another issue. But after two months of voice rest, during which Newsom could only record her harp and piano parts for the album, she started singing with a newfound beauty that should silence detractors.

She also saw a vocal coach to learn to sing in a healthier way and prevent injury. "That changed my relationship with my voice a lot, and I think it has changed my voice itself," says Newsom, 28. "The way that I started to approach my singing corresponded with the way the songs are supposed to feel. My experience of singing had been somewhat abstracted before, and suddenly it was made much more physical or corporeal. I was aware."

Indeed, apart from its two-hour sprawl, Have One on Me projects more of an earthy vibe than Ys. That album spanned five songs averaging 11 minutes in length and seemed archaic in language and allegory, underscored by orchestration from Van Dyke Parks.

Have One on Me pushes a similar envelope in its title track, a recasting of the story of Lola Montez, a courtesan to the King of Bavaria. But Newsom also taps simpler love songs, crooning "My man and me, we could rest and remain here," in opener "Easy."

She acknowledges the album's recurring themes of home and love, "be that familial or romantic or plutonic or some sort of divine experience." And it suits her newly elegant vocals, which more closely evoke Kate Bush than past work that suggested Björk's Appalachian cousin.

> Her newly elegant vocals more closely evoke Kate Bush than Björk's Appalachian cousin.

"I've always written what to me are love songs, but they're not necessarily taken as such," the California native says from an L.A. hotel. "There's more lyrical directness on this album, so suddenly I think some people might consider it more accessible."

In turn, her collaborative bandmates Ryan Francesconi (guitar, banjo, Bulgarian tambura) and Neal Morgan (percussion) anchor an ensemble of strings and horns with subtle strokes. Five songs feature only Newsom's solo backing on harp or piano. "If there's a question if something is needed or not, it's probably not," she says. "I have a very reductive approach to arrangement."

The heart of Newsom's sound remains the full-size pedal harp, usually associated with classical music. Coming from a musically trained family, Newsom studied that repertoire after picking up the harp at age 8, but her main interest was folk music. In her teens, Newsom developed a fascination with both West African kora music and Alan Lomax's field recordings—particularly of the idiosyncratic Appalachian ballad singer Texas Gladden.

Self-conscious about singing as an adolescent, Newsom wrote poetry and stuck to the harp, apart from character roles in school musicals. "My tone was very strange," she says. "It was always like, 'Give her the voice of the wicked witch!'"

But later, while studying composition at Mills College, she was charmed by one of Gladden's records. "Somehow I heard similarities," Newsom says. "I was like, 'If I can have this response to her voice, that should be validation that it's possible for me to make music that someone might think is worth hearing.'"

Indie-icon Will Oldham became that someone. Before Newsom sang her songs in public, she burned them on CD for a friend who happened to attend an Oldham show and pass him the disc. Oldham took Newsom on tour and signed her to his label, which released her 2004 debut The Milk-Eyed Mender. She never looked back.

"The only thing that combined everything that I loved was to write songs," says Newsom, who has sold out a March 17 date at Sanders Theatre. "And that ended up being what I got to do." ✖✖✖

Better and Verse

Prose Is a Thing With Feathers

To say that Jerome Charyn has walked a mile in Emily Dickinson's shoes is an understatement. He's pretty much worn her dress, strapped on her bonnet and channeled her ghost. In his latest novel, The Secret Life of Emily Dickinson, Charyn devotes 352 pages of first-person fiction to recreating the life of the Belle of Amherst. He reads from his mosaic of invention and history on March 9 at the Harvard Book Store. Tom Samph

BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER WRASTLIN' A GATOR AT THE SWAMP BUGGY RACES, HELD MARCH 6–7 IN NAPLES, FLORIDA

Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.

The famous terra-cotta warriors of Xian, China, occasionally sprout the heads of "Improper" readers, like this one resembling Ed Fitzgerald.

While skiing the Swiss Alps, Christian Mossiman and Alexa Burger were saddened to realize that the Matterhorn isn't actually made of Toblerone chocolate.

On their recent trip to Antarctica, Neal Robert and Julia Cruz discovered that emperor penguins subsist on a diet of silverfish, krill and lively reading material, like our Year-End issue.

Keisha Whitaker posed with Lou Markakis, host and producer of the TV show "North Shore 100." Be afraid, Lou. We hear that cover boy Conan O'Brien's looking for a new gig.

THE RAY TYE MEDICAL AID FOUNDATION
WE WILL NEVER STOP CARING

A LETTER FROM RWANDA

You have a nice welcome note when someone searches for your Foundation. It says

WE NEVER STOP CARING! WHEN YOU SAVE A LIFE YOU SAVE THE FUTURE.

Allow me to congratulate for this mission because you put it in practice, you do not only say it. Today, my objective is to thank you so much for paying my heart surgery.

Mr Tye with Erneste

I would like to be a doctor when I grow up and help other as you helped me. I wish to be a cardiologist, and I will like to come back to the United States for my college education.

I thank you once again for helping me and my God already blessed you.

Thanks.
Erneste.

Dear Erneste,

Thank you for your beautiful note.

YOU ARE THE FUTURE.

I hope that as you grow up you realize that helping someone else is the greatest mission you can have.

God bless you,

Ray Tye

Chef Jamie Mammano and Executive Chef Robert Jean work together to create cuisine that is equally fresh, authentic and contemporary Italian as well as featuring a selection of items from a wood grill. Full bar, extensive wine list, complimentary valet parking, and a striking private dining room are welcome amenities. Dinner Sunday-Saturday.

MISTRAL [223 Columbus Ave, Boston, 617-867-9300, www.mistralbistro.com] Located in Boston's stylish South End, Mistral features the award winning French Mediterranean cuisine of Chef/Owner Jamie Mammano. The dining room's high ceilings and arched floor to ceiling windows encircle the candlelit room and evoke a warm feeling of casual sophistication. Le Salon du Mistral, Mistral's private dining room provides an intimate setting for gatherings of 60 seated and up to 80 for a cocktail reception. Dinner Sunday-Saturday. Complimentary car service available in metro Boston.

ROGGIE'S NEW AGE BREW & GRILLE [356 Chestnut Hill Avenue, Cleveland Circle, Brighton, 617-566-1880, www.roggies.com] This all time favorite restaurant and bar has over 52 beers on tap. Come enjoy breakfast all day, lunch, and dinner. Extensive menu ranging from sandwiches, ribs, pizza, to pasta. Catering also available as well as party platters, call 617-713-0555.

SAMURAI BOSTON [827 Boylston Street, Boston, 617-236-7672. www.samurai-boston.com] From the toro to the Pink Lady maki, every bite melts in your mouth. Samurai Boston offers innovative rolls and martinis that are a nice change for those bored with traditional styles, but don't worry if someone in your party isn't a raw fish fan, Samurai Boston offers an extensive menu of Korean and Japanese cuisine. Located in the Back Bay, across the street from the entrance to the Prudential, Samurai Boston is open daily for lunch and dinner.

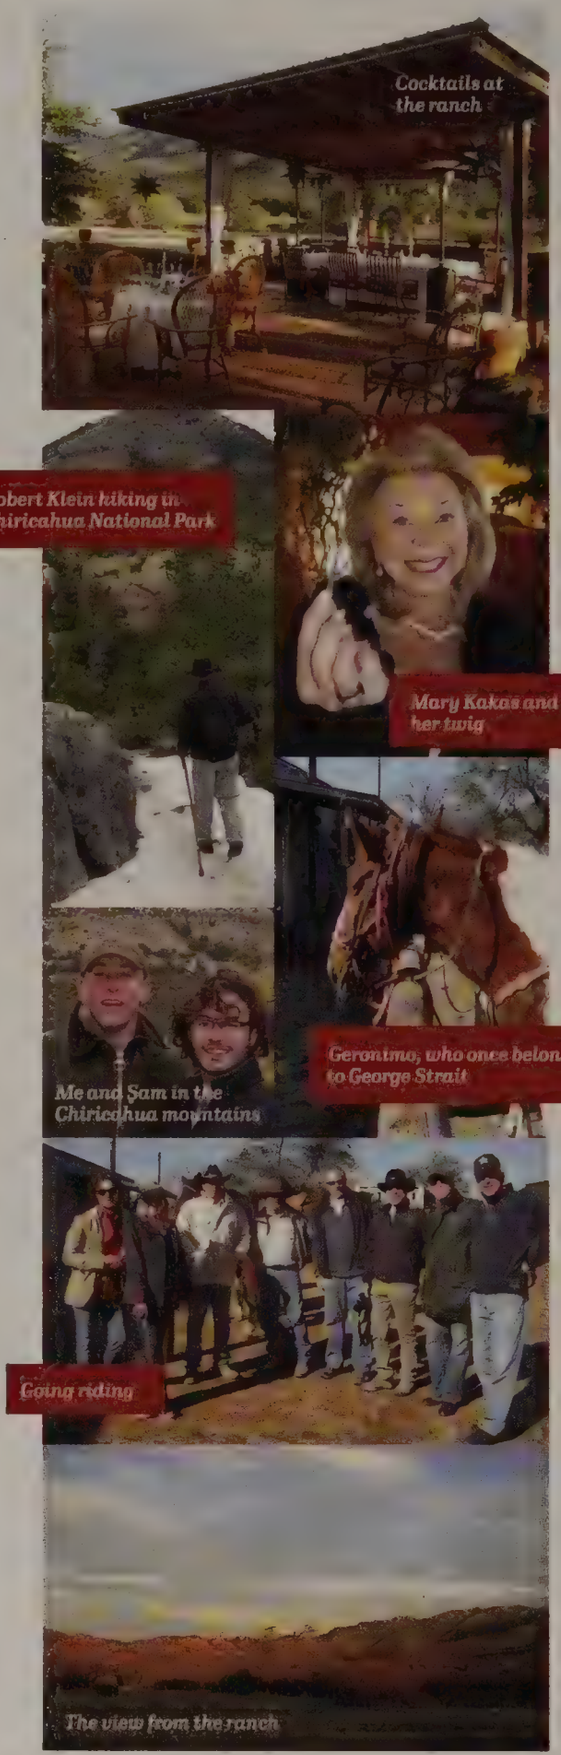
WEST INTENTIONS



Just Deserts

So you're a guest at a big-ticket fundraiser in the ballroom of the Mandarin Oriental. Your charming other half is sitting next to a woman who impulsively invites the two of you to a salon weekend that she and her husband are hosting at a ranch they own near Tucson, Ariz. As a Bostonian, the prospect of sunshine in February makes you instantly respond, "We'd love to!" even though, as one friend puts it, "You hardly know these people! It's either a cult or some weird sex thing," while your brother, a doctor, predicts that they're planning to harvest your organs.

Then an elaborate and beautiful invitation arrives, packed in a wooden crate with cryptic descriptions of what to expect, along with the admonition to "come prepared to talk about one of your passions." There's an Agatha Christie quality to it, like being asked to attend Davos, Renaissance Weekend, or the Allen & Company Sun Valley Conference, minus all the security, helicopter wash and titanic egos.

The enigmatic allure leads you to book plane tickets, which is how we found ourselves flying into Tucson on a Friday morning and driving two hours through the Sonoran desert, past the highway that leads to Tombstone (where Wyatt Earp and Doc Holliday had the gunfight at the OK Corral), past Cochise Stronghold (where the great Apache chief made his last stand against the Feds), past a Wal-Mart that the Coen Brothers and Quentin Tarantino couldn't come up with on acid, past Beck's Show Pigs and Feed, the Sunzona Baptist Church, and across grasslands as monotonously beautiful as the Serengeti. We went through a checkpoint for U.S. Customs and Border Control, negotiated close to six miles of pitted mud in a rental car that was decidedly unfit for off-roading and finally arrived at Sunglow Ranch. Nestled at the base of the Chiricahua Mountains, it's considered sacred ground by the Apaches, and it's where Geronimo hid out from the Feds. It also abuts a sizable swathe of National Forest filled with lions and cougars and bears—oh, my!—and it's about as close to a postcard of the Old West as you can get without actually riding herd with John Wayne.

We were greeted by our hosts: Chrissy Kazis, owner of a recruiting firm, and her husband, Mitch Sayare—an MD, professor, biotech mogul and an amateur (but professional-caliber) photographer and astronomer (which is what drew him to the area in the first place). Over the next few hours, like the ensemble cast from a Noël Coward play, the other guests assembled, 13 in all. Some of us knew each other. Most of us didn't. Those I knew included Mary Kakas, the irrepressibly upbeat furrier turned philanthropist, art dealer Robert Klein, whose Newbury Street gallery is one of the country's premier sources for fine photography, and Bonnie and Merle Berger—she's a political activist, he's a world-famous pioneer in reproductive medicine. Then there was Jim Fiala, a Back Bay businessman who I couldn't place until he remembered giving me a ride to a party in Newport once, and his wife, Teresa, a flight attendant whose accent is unmistakably Memphis. Like in Clue, there was a professor, Peter Hawkins of Yale, although thankfully, no one murdered him in the library with a candlestick. Then there was Sue Irving, a marketing executive, with her other half, Mike Alexis, a building contractor who focuses on environmental projects, and the Colorado-based Dempseys—Chip, a commodities trader turned social entrepreneur, and his wife, Jen, a PhD candidate. It was an eclectic crew, to say the least.

After dinner, the salon began, with five people making presentations, followed by lively discussion (accompanied by plenty of bourbon). The next morning, a group of us went riding in the Coronado National Forest (my horse, I'm proud to say, once belonged to country music star George Strait), which was followed by high tea back at the ranch (where a string quartet serenaded us and Mary Kakas showed off the twig that had lodged itself in her cleavage while riding). For a bit of R&R, I scheduled a massage with a woman whose family had been ranching the area for four generations and whose great-grandfather had been a deputy for Wyatt Earp. A delicious dinner was followed by another fascinating evening of discussion and debate, while the next morning offered the opportunity for a snowy hike in Chiricahua National Park, which could just as easily be named Giant Phallus National Park, given the huge and hugely suggestive rock formations.

But the weekend's focus remained the salon, and if you'd ever told me that I would spend three days in Outer Nowhere, Ariz., engaged in scintillating dialogue about everything from Dante's Inferno to football to how Hillary Clinton dropped the ball to the Motion Picture Production Code of 1930, I would've never believed you.

To misquote Eleanor Roosevelt: "Small minds discuss people. Average minds discuss events. Great minds discuss ideas." Thanks to the salon at Sunglow Ranch, a group of us were allowed to feel like great minds, if only for a weekend. ✖✖✖

Wined and Dined

Dinner was served. The roasted chicken breast sat on a bed of black trumpet mushrooms. And I sat on a stool. I've long been a fan of eating at the bar. Less of a production. Less pressure to order multiple courses. More money to spend on wine.

That preference used to mean settling for a burger, but these days gourmet food is within reaching distance of the beer taps. Local chefs have adapted to the times with menus dedicated to the drinking side of the house. In this issue, you'll find 10 tasty dishes that cost about the same as a movie ticket.

Of course, location doesn't matter if you've got good company and cuisine. We've printed the recipes for meals beloved by the regulars at five neighborhood restaurants, so you can recreate them at home. The conversation is another story. Maybe invite a bartender over to your place.

Beard Science

HONOR ROLL

WHEN CHEFS compare the size of their resumes, the biggest bragging point is a James Beard Foundation award. A slew of semifinalists always comes from Massachusetts, but I could bet 2010 Island throw so many garlands into the same spare mailbag—Cambridge's Central Square boasts 3 nominees for outstanding chef (Ana Sortun, Oleana), rising star chef (Will Gilson, Garden at the Cellar), pastry chef (Maura Kilpatrick, Sofra) and two best chefs: Northeast (Steve Johnson, Rendezvous; Tony Maws, Craigie on Main). Finalists are announced on March 22. Make reservations now. ANDREW BRIMAS

Going Out

Stars and Bars

In just eight days, Brookline's Roadhouse was broken down and repackaged. The walls were repainted and the kitchen gutted. Months earlier, the custom smoker—the vital, clotted heart of any BBQ joint—was put down after neighbors complained about the beefy smog. Seems they weren't fans of the food either.

"The local people had a bad taste in their mouths," chef Corey French says. Taking a breather in one of the roomy restaurant's booths, he explains, "With the Roadhouse, it was more of a beer bar, more loud music and a college atmosphere. We toned it down and brightened it up."

The renamed American Craft opened on March 3. While the ambience may have relaxed, the menu is an unapologetic monster truck of nationalistic cuisine. The two bars pour all domestic wines and 40 American craft beers on tap. Possible burger toppings number 30. Baked four-cheese rigatoni comes with a 10-ounce meatball. There's an oversized crispy-chicken-skin club sandwich.

"That was something I played with at Gourmet [Caterers]," French says. "We used to do it as a joke. The first one was eight to 10 inches big."

Kidding aside, he's serious about appeasing the neighbors. The new approach combines comfort with farm-fresh ingredients sourced from five area farms. It's all about being local.

Drink of the Moment

WORLD TOUR

NICE SHOT Drink Irish whiskey at River Gods

River Gods bartender Maureen Linnane hails from Galway. GM Caroline Enright is a County Kerry native. Better guides through Irish drink would be hard to find, and, for your benefit, they've devised a tasting map for the Water of Life. "We were thinking of an inventive way to sample Ireland," Enright says. "From the comfort of a barstool," Linnane adds.

Things start up north on the rugged coast of Antrim with the kick-in-the-pants that's BUSHMILLS ($7.25). The trail ends on the southern shore in Cork, a city claiming PADDY ($7), a smoother, 231-year-old dram that only recently arrived in the States. "It takes money to come to America," Linnane explains.

"And there's enough people in Ireland to drink it," Enright chimes in.

The tasting tour includes nine sojourns, some offering mixes like the hot toddy with POWERS ($8.50), but the duo's favorite is Dublin, where JAMESON ($7.25) has the base note of sweetness characteristic of many Irish whiskeys, due to distillation with both malted and unmalted barley.

The trek takes place all month, but St. Patrick's would be a fine day to set sail. There may be bagpipes, the staff may break out in dance and the cuisine will suit the mood. "But there's enough food in Guinness, to be honest with you," Enright states.

"'For Strength,' after all," Linnane concludes. NICK ALTSCHULLER

HAVE MONEY, WILL TROUBLE

TO THE ELITIST BITCH IN THE SOUTH END: I'm not writing to complain about the fact that your voice is what Lloyd Christmas really had in mind when he spoke of the "most annoying sound in the world," or about how you hire a nanny to raise your kids when you don't even seem to have a job. What really gets my goat is the fact that you are an entitled douche. I understand how parking in the two-car space behind your home could be hard for you, as climbing that extra set of stairs must be a real effort. But continually foregoing your private parking in favor of taking up TWO valuable street spaces with your luxury SUV just takes the cake. Did you forget that it's winter in Boston? Was it the million-dollar renovation of your house that makes you think you own the neighborhood? If you don't want your prime personal parking space, I'll gladly take it off your hands. Someone with common sense

To Bostonians:

I was born and raised [a] Bostonian. I have a hard persona but a soft heart, which I hide unless I have an opportunity to help someone, or to make a kind gesture without looking weak. I would like to suggest that, with the state of our economy, we consider how well some of us may be doing, and how some may not. Often I have done something for someone, but I have also blocked some people asking for help. It's easy to do, because there are so many people taking advantage of others. Give your community a kind thought or gesture. "Pay it forward," and see what you can do for someone who might appreciate it. Maybe we will read the story of a kind gesture in this column that's not exaggerated. Just thinking out loud

What's the key to running a successful Irish pub?

ASK THE EXPERT

Tom Clark

PROMINENT IRISH BOSTONIAN AND PRESIDENT OF THE CATALYST COMPANY

I THINK THE SUCCESS of a pub in Boston starts with the management and the help that they hire. It's easy for the Irish, because it goes back to the talk, to the Irish craic—it's a Gaelic word that means fun, communal conversation. It's the Irish form of fun. You [can't] have loud music. And you have to have locals—people that come and make it their establishment after work or at lunch. The staff has to be friendly. They have to remember [a local's] name or drink.

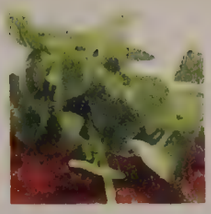
On Tap

Beer for Winos

Belgian Abbey Ales come in tall bottles sealed with corks and wire cages. Even from a short distance, they look very much like Champagne, which explains why an unsuspecting wine geek might gravitate towards them. Almost as high in octane as some vino (8.5 to 10-plus percent alcohol by volume), the beers are creamy in texture with lush, malty flavors. The three recommended here (available at Downtown Wine and Spirits in Somerville) are referred to as "Dubbels," or strong, brown ales that start off their brewing lives with more barley malt in the kettle and therefore end up with more of the good stuff in your glass. Produced on a small scale and "bottle conditioned," meaning naturally carbonated (again the Champagne connection), they have rich, foamy heads and taste great with braised meat dishes as well as tuna and swordfish. And unlike many of the faddish beers, particularly from American microbreweries, the bittering hops are firmly under control.

Maredsous Bruin: Tall, dark and handsome, this is the strongest tasting of the trio and the most opaque in color. With smoky, caramel and pungent herb aromas that veer into chocolate fudge with some aeration, the ale's 8 percent alcohol content supports a nice hit of spice on the palate. Tobacco, cloves, chicory—they're all ripe up front. The bittersweet chocolate aftertaste brings it full circle. It's very nicely balanced, complete and satisfying.

Ommegang: OK, this one's a pretender... but it's under Belgian ownership, it tastes like the real thing, and you can visit the artisan brewery in Cooperstown, N.Y., without a passport. Smoothest of all and perhaps the least complex, the beer's medium-yellow-brown in color with some reddish highlights. It has an orange, honeyed, apple-butter fragrance and is rounder and milder than the true Belgian examples. Delicate with a citrus finish, it's easy to drink and wouldn't overpower lighter, springtime dishes.



St. Bernardus Abt 12: Everyone's got a favorite, the best of the best, and for me this is it. One taste, and you understand why the monk on the label is smiling. Medium-amber-brown with some reddish highlights, this ale has a cherry, brown bread, oat-like aroma that's warm and engaging. It tastes slightly sweet with creamy milk-chocolate notes accented by more cherry flavors. Seamlessly balanced, it seems to have a lower level of hops, but that might just be an illusion because the malt is so luscious and the alcohol weighs in at 10 percent.

BRING ON BERGAMOT

It's all about food.

WHAT CHEF KEITH Pooler brings to his new venture, besides years of experience in some of Boston's finest restaurants, is a certain level of self-awareness: "I'm totally one-dimensional," he says. "I can't even talk about the Red Sox. It's all about food."

At Bergamot, Pooler will count on co-owner/general manager Servio Garcia to handle the front of the house, while he uses local purveyors to source the raw ingredients—or at least most of them—for his "progressive American cuisine."

"It's not always what's local," he says. "The best snails are from Burgundy, the best hearts of palm from Hawaii." Bergamot, named for the citrus fruit best known for flavoring Earl Grey tea, is slated to open this month in the Somerville space occupied by EVOO, which moved to Cambridge.

HAPPY RETURNS: El Pelón is back. Jim Hoben's taqueria, whose Fenway location burned down just over a year ago, will reopen across the street from Boston College's main entrance at 2193 Comm. Ave. Expect the same menu, except for tamales, which will be featured as an occasional special, along with black-bean soup and fried ice cream. Also expect to see familiar faces: The same staff is back. Here's either a promise or a warning: Hoben plans to rekindle the infamous hot-pepper eating contest. Another promise: The Peterborough Street El Pelón will rise again, but not in the near future.

IT'S OFFICIAL: Flour Bakery will open an outpost in Central Square in Cambridge by early summer. And the Lyons Group is cooking up a major new project called Towne Stove and Spirits—details next

Real-life dog dramas

VETERINARIAN NICK TROUT wears his heart on his sleeve—more like four hearts. Though he works with the highest-tech equipment at Angell Animal Medical Center, where pets receive treatments fit for a human king, Trout's deep engagement with dogs and their owners makes the strongest impression. He follows two real-life dramas here, in his novelistic way.

In one, Sandi, the mother, and daughter Sonja have a tensely fraught relationship. While Sonja is caring for Sandi's beloved Cleo, the dog gets injured. Guilty Sonja secretly whisks Cleo from Bermuda to Boston for surgery. But despite Trout and his colleagues' extreme measures, the dog dies on the operating table. Trout's empathy is like an accordion, stretching wide.

Love Is the Best Medicine
by Dr. Nick Trout

Trout is a staff surgeon at Angell Animal Medical Center in Boston.

This surrogate daughter-dog had been both a symbol of competition and an object, at last, of joint affection. And now she's gone. To his relief, Sandi forgives the tormented Trout and suggests that Cleo's spirit can serve as an amulet of sorts for future patients. Which happens when another dog, Helen, has cancer surgery and appears doomed. Trout discovers that Helen lives and, in a romantically rich discourse on love and loss, explores the animal-to-owner connection. ***

"Essentially I'm working construction. I'm the guy splicing wires, welding pipes, shoring up support beams, and generally renovating the house. All the other stuff, the important stuff, I cannot influence. These are the intangibles, the memories, the history, the bonds, the things that make the difference between a house and a home, the things that make the difference between a body covered in scales or feathers or fur and our pet. It is this everything that eludes me. This everything else is the spirit of the animal."

ROYAL TREATMENT

The Regal Beagle marks its territory in Coolidge Corner.

FISH UPON A STAR Scallops and halibut shine at the Beagle.

THE NAME, DERIVED FROM an old sitcom, gave me pause. Often cute monikers and gimmicks exhaust a spot's creative energies. Not so here. The Regal Beagle serves the best-prepared and tastiest food I've eaten in Brookline.

The space is a success, too. Occupying a long, narrow storefront in Coolidge Corner, the restaurant's handsome design includes a banquette and several smaller tables. In the back, a cozy bar accommodates a neighborhood crowd.

After taking our seats, we indulged in fresh Iggy's bread and house-made crackers while studying the varied menu. We began by ordering the dates wrapped in bacon and stuffed with Gorgonzola cheese ($4). The sweet, savory and creamy combination was a winner. Likewise, we enjoyed the Caesar salad ($7). Pork belly ($7), braised with apples and caramelized vinegar, packed a serious flavor punch.

Chef Laura Henry-Zoubir has a particularly winning way with seafood: Fresh thyme made the buttery fish chowder ($5) a memorable dish. Careful pan-searing worked wonders on a fine piece of halibut ($20), which married nicely with a sherry beurre blanc. Layered with braised lentils and roasted carrots, it looked picture perfect. Six sea scallops ($19) had sweet and nutty notes enhanced by a dusting of pistachios. The accompanying butternut-squash risotto, sprinkled with baby-beet greens and cherries, can stand on its own. In fact, it comes as a side dish ($5), as do the lentils and the carrots.

Sirloin steak ($21) was well-seared and juicy. An accompanying salsa verde added a nice zesty note. The tender, roasted half-chicken ($18) benefited from delectable sautéed mushrooms and Swiss chard, but I would've omitted the runny polenta. Finally, of the two pasta selections, I tried the fusilli ($13). Served in a cast-iron pan with ricotta, cauliflower, chickpeas and a touch of tomato, the oven-baked dish was at once remarkably light and substantial. A white-chocolate bread pudding placed a sweet punctuation mark at the end of a worthy feast.

To accompany its fine food, the Beagle offers 21 varieties of beer and 17 wines, all at reasonable prices. I especially enjoyed the 2007 Diseño malbec ($28), with mouth-filling flavor and good acidity. On the white side, I found the Celestin Blondeau ($24), a 2007 sauvignon blanc from the Loire, delightfully crisp and refreshing.

Servers were helpful and attentive without hovering. They seemed genuinely enthusiastic about the quality of the food and radiated hospitality, making me feel more like an honored guest than a mere customer. As the last of my apprehensions disappeared, I shared their excitement. ×××

IT'S A VAMPEDE

Pop culture brings the undead back to life.

I'M SO SICK OF VAMPIRES. At first I was psyched about the whole vampire thing. True Blood is a cool show. I'm not into Twilight, but as someone who's pale, moody and sensitive, I welcomed the suddenly sexy connotations of those qualities. Even when things got a little silly, like the release of the book Abraham Lincoln, Vampire Hunter, I was OK with it. But this undead blood-drinking creature-of-the-night craze has had a pernicious side effect: Now that vampires are accepted by popular culture, they're totally everywhere. And vampires are annoying.

Vampires used to stay in their coffins and occasionally abduct someone in such a way that they weren't implicated. These days they're out and about, and you see them all the time. And vampires are the most socially awkward people alive. Or dead, I suppose. Vampires are always talking about the olden days and reminding you how long they've been around. They're like an annoying, bloodsucking version of your grandpa. Before he got turned into a vampire.

The other day I was at CVS and this vampire in front of me was taking forever. He was trying to pay in farthings, and I guess he saw the look on my face, because he was like, "Sorry, I found these in the back of my credenza, and I figured it was time to spend them." Well, I had plenty of time to wonder what a credenza was, because, of course, the kid at the register couldn't find the exchange rate for old vampire money. Hey buddy, ever hear of Vampire Coinstar?

Anyway, you won't believe what he was buying: Centrum. I couldn't help asking, "Hey, why do you need multivitamins? You're immortal." He responded that multivitamins are good for everyone, which I guess is true. But man, vampires are tough to take sometimes.

Last month I went down to Florida, which you'd think would be pretty short on vampires, what with the sunshine, but on the way back, I was stuck sitting next to one. And let me tell you, he wouldn't shut his yapper, going on and on about the new velvet in his coffin and how crazy the Crimean War was. Finally, he put on his headphones and started watching TV, and naturally he found an episode of Two and a Half Men, which we now know to be a vampire sitcom. All the vampires on the plane must've been watching it, because about every 10 seconds the whole plane was filled with deafening vampire laughs—you know, "Nya-ha-ha-AAH!" These guys still don't understand how headphones work.

I know it's politically incorrect to say this, but vampires also smell bad. That's not a stereotype; it's a fact. Even when they're wearing Drakkar Noir, as they're wont to do, you can still smell the funk a mile away. It's like mothballs and burnt hair. And don't get me started on their farts.

Vampires are always talking about the olden days and reminding you how long they've been around.

The emergence of vampires also causes aggravating situations in the workplace. There are a million examples, but I'll give you just one: You know those workplace-safety posters by the water cooler? Well, now that we've hired some vampires, those things take up the entire wall, so there's no room for the funny Dilbert clippings I used to hang. Instead, it's all about what to do in the event of sunlight, and how garlic must be clearly labeled in the office fridge, and how wooden chopsticks are prohibited. And you can't even say "vampire," because some of them find it offensive. They prefer to be called "differently animated persons." But then when the vampire comedians say "vampire," it's OK.

Worst of all, the mainstream acceptance of the undead means that our vampire-fantasy literature is rendered mundane. That's why I'm working on a book that'll fire up a new phenomenon. First, everyone got into wizards. Next, everyone was obsessed with vampires. Well, here comes the Sasquatch.

My new series, Snowbound, is about a tragic love triangle between a girl, a chupacabra and a Sasquatch. Here's an excerpt to whet your appetite: "Sas, I love you, but we can never be together! Next year, I go to college, and you'll still be living in this cave in the Yukon, working on your novel and protecting hikers, who nevertheless fear and misunderstand you. And... my heart belongs to someone else. A mysterious lothario who blew into my life and swept me off my feet when he wasn't disemboweling cattle near Juarez. I need to be with the chupacabra, Sas. Unless you want to fight him with your shirt off." ×××

THE MIRAGE

The seduction of California

EVERYTHING CHANGES IN life, whether we want it to or not. I first visited Los Angeles after a session in the Army Medical Corps in San Antonio. My roommate was Gary Geiger, center fielder for the Red Sox. After my short tour of duty, I hitchhiked to L.A. to seek my fortune as a screenwriter for movies or television. Los Angeles was a magical place then, flowers and vegetables and trees looking and smelling like fictional oases. I had several interviews, having received introductions to a few high-level producers and studio heads. In each case, the men I saw told me the same story. "Kid," they'd say, "do yourself a favor. Go back home and go into the family business, whatever it is. You do not want to go through what I did to get to where I am."

Folks who are successful almost never believe that anyone else, particularly young people, can make it big. They will mostly discourage you. But no one can discourage you like Hollywood types. Furthermore, they don't want you to make it. And for those of you who can't wait to get to Movieland and knock 'em dead, here's another little story that illustrates what you're likely to encounter. When I was interviewing for jobs long ago, I sat in on a pitch to a producer with an experienced writer who was presenting a Civil War idea for a series about two brothers. The producer leaned back in his La-Z-Boy chair, hands folded over his ample tummy, eyes closed. The writer pitched on. Snap! The producer popped the chair upright, eyes open, spouting, "I see two helicopters." This was supposed to be a Civil War story. Be prepared for stuff like this in Tinseltown and remember to take good notes.

For insight on California, I always take my friend Don out to dinner when we visit. He lives in Santa Barbara and grew up in Pasadena, home of the Rose Bowl. "Here's what you've got to understand about the former Golden State," Don told me on a recent trip. "We constantly live, like people in no other state, in fear of fire, flood and earthquake." Don has an automatic shutoff system for his gas intake in case of disaster. "This nagging anxiety," he went on, produces a lot of Looney Tunes behavior, a lot of nutcakes. I had a cabbie last week, sang Beach Boys songs the entire ride. 'Barbara Ann.' Even while I paid him, he never stopped."

One of my uncles lived in Bel Air, and during a fire that threatened his house, his daughter's high-school boyfriend stood on the roof spraying the surface with water trying to save it. "All for love," my uncle told me. The lovers did marry some years later. It lasted two months, the family's fastest breakup. "This seems typical of many California relationships," my uncle said to me at the time. "Too many choices for leisure, outdoor activities; too many fads and distractions for people to stay together. Even I," he said, "who grew up in Boston, got infected by the seduction of California. I have an orange tree in my backyard. I have an avocado tree. I have a night-blooming orchid that only emerges one time a year. I can swim in my pool. My daughter grew up playing with Tina Sinatra. It may seem all unreal. But it's my unreal. And our friends seem to feel the same way."

Visiting California, I've observed some very disturbing behavior over the course of a week. Perhaps it drives people nuts encountering such beauty while, at the same time, dealing with gridlock on the highways, fiscal madness, dreams of Hollywood and a society brimming with discontent. Outside of the Montecito Post Office, I was stopped by two acolytes of Lyndon LaRouche, the fascist who ran for president and ended up serving 15 years in jail. "Stop Obama now," they preached, just as a BMW peeled by with the vanity plate, "FREEDABE." Later that day someone told me, "Three hundred people were arrested in the hills for being at a cockfighting event." But my favorite California moment this past trip happened at dinner at a glitzy, private beach club. Long-ago photos of celebrities hung on the wall at the bar. Our hostess pointed out one showing her in a gown, glamorous at 18, standing next to Bing Crosby who has an astonished look on his face. "I was goosing him," she said. Not a White Christmas moment.

Enough is enough, I thought. Let's see, it's either cockfighting tonight, or if I'd been back East, the Beanpot Tourney. After several weeks in California, I missed the three things that define Boston: sports, politics and revenge. When the highlight of each day is Meyer lemons squeezed into my vodka, it's time to come home. ×××

2 LOST AUDITION TAPES

(IN THE SPIRIT OF BIG BABY'S ALMOST STARRING ROLE IN THE BLIND SIDE)

Inglourious Closers "We're gonna be doin' one thing, and one thing only... killin' Nazis!!" "OK, cut! Listen, Jonathan, that was great, but I'm not sure about the whole 'Lt. Raine step dances around the Nazi scalps' thing. Can we try it again, on script? Thanks."

Up in the Film Room "If you think about your favorite memories, the most important moments in your life... were you alone? Life's better with company." "Aww hell, are you serious with this crap?" "OK, I'm sorry Mr. Belichick, but I think we're gonna go in another direction."

3 Names in the News

Wilfork's World "If you don't want to win, you don't need to be here." And with those words, Vince Wilfork took control of the Patriots defense. Good. Somebody needed to. And who better than the guy who just realized, "Uh oh. Win or lose, I'm stuck here. And man, I hate to effing lose."

Retiring Red Sox Remember that guy in your freshman dorm who willingly sabotaged his sex life by hanging a homoerotic poster above his bed? That was me, and it was a Nomar poster. So I feel qualified to call his recent "retire with the Red Sox" ceremony a heaping pile of Wally droppings. That's all.

Not So Savy Which is more upsetting: That Matt Cooke wasn't suspended, or that no one kicked his ass after the cheap shot? I'll take the latter, which hurt on a deeper level. The lack of punishment just added insult to injury. Like if you walked in on your best friend sleeping with your wife, and then the next day he won the lottery.

1 ONE GUARANTEED MARCH MADNESS SLEEPER*

Saint Mary's. They're hot—having just beaten Gonzaga. They have an unstoppable low-post presence in Omar Samhan (21 and 11 per game). And with five Aussies on their roster, they have an entire country behind them! Sweet 16. Mark it down. *Sorry for the jinx.

5 C'S STORYLINES

AGONY OF DA FEET
Pierce on the mend

The Truth Hurts First it was the knee, then it was the foot, then it was the thumb. Didn't it feel like the Captain was breaking down before our eyes? But now he's finally healthy, and while he's nowhere close to even midseason form, somehow I'm not worried. It'll take a lot more than a few bruises to wane my confidence in Playoff Paul Pierce. Although, I'm easily swayed.

Marked Man There hasn't been much excitement over the Michael Finley signing, and given that he'll barely burn 10 minutes a night, that's probably justified. But still, I can't shake the feeling that Finley's ripe for at least one huge playoff moment—think Starbury in Game 5 vs. the Magic. You heard it here first; it's going to happen. (Unless the Croatian mafia takes him down for stealing Dino Radja's number.)

What You Kneed? I'm slightly surprised, but it's mid-March and KG's still standing. At this point, we've all conceded that he'll never be the same, but more important, so has he. And as KG continues to adjust to his new limitations, we can continue to broaden our own expectations. (Here's the part of the column where I fantasize about 2008 and violently cry into my pillow.)

Seldom Williams I'd never suggest that Shelden Williams is the lone answer to any of the Celtics' problems. But I will say this: Anytime the guy's out there, it's automatic energy, rebounding and hustle—three things the team always needs. Plus, with Shelden, more playing time equals less Twitter time, and that's good news for everyone.

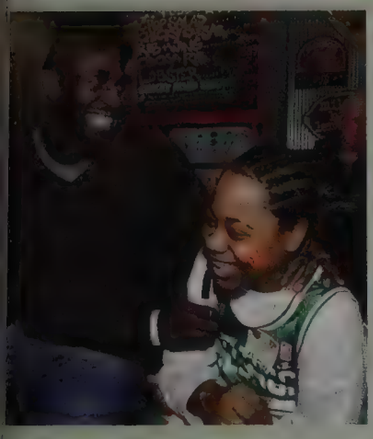
Quote of the Year "I think we step up more in big games," Rasheed Wallace said after a blowout loss to Memphis. FYI: Boston's record in games against the NBA's Top 7 teams? 4-12. That's 33 percent, which, by the way, is four points higher than Sheed's three-point percentage.

4 DATES TO WATCH

3/17 Eddie House returns to the Garden! Nate Robinson takes on his former team! It's pandemo... What? We already did this? OK, fine. It's plain old Knicks vs. C's. Happy now?

3/18 Evil Matt Cooke and the Penguins come to town, and the Bruins will be out for blood! Or at the very least, a harmless bitch slap.

3/19 The Texas Triangle becomes... the Texas Diagonal Line? Eh, maybe not. Either way, the C's begin a tough back-to-back against the Rockets and Mavs.



3/20 Finally, something more boring than a Red Sox vs. Orioles regular season game. It's Red Sox vs. Orioles, live from City of Palms Park!

is a dialogue."

Soroff On JODY ADAMS

The Cambridge chef dishes on home cooking, Rachael Ray and the magical qualities of blenders.

JAMES BEARD AWARD–WINNER JODY ADAMS, owner of Rialto in Cambridge, appears this season on Top Chef Masters, premiering April 7 on Bravo. After graduating from Brown University with a degree in anthropology, Adams trained under Lydia Shire at the Bostonian Hotel. She helped open Hamersley's Bistro before taking the helm at Michaela's. In 1993, Food and Wine named her one of America's 10 best new chefs. The following year, Adams opened Rialto, where she's earned national acclaim for her interpretation of regional Italian cuisine using fresh New England ingredients. In 2002, she published her cookbook, In the Hands of a Chef: Cooking With Jody Adams of Rialto Restaurant, cowritten with her husband, Ken Rivard. They live with their two children in Somerville.

Jonathan Soroff: Favorite bar snack?

Jody Adams: It's got to be our stuffed, fried olives [at Rialto]. That, or bruschetta with salt cod.

Cocktail of choice?
Scotch on the rocks. Two rocks. I like an 18-year Macallan, but if I'm reminiscing about my father, it's Johnnie Walker Red. Sweet cocktails? Not interested.

How do you feel about celebrity chefs?
It started with television, and it got a big kick up when someone figured out that if they asked Wolfgang Puck to head up Meals on Wheels in Los Angeles, they could raise a lot of money. And now diners and chefs have benefited enormously from it. Do I think people should believe the hype? No.

How many restaurants can a chef own before something's gotta give?
One. Something's gotta give no matter what, whether you're operating 20 restaurants or just one. What somebody like Todd English is doing is very different than what I'm doing. I know that if I'm not watching what's happening at the antipasti station, and I'm only focused on the pasta station, things can go awry.

Most annoying food trend?
It doesn't really have to do with food, but I'd have to say the outline of the pig. There's a butcher's outline of a pig everywhere you look, whether it's on a sign, or a menu or tattooed on a chef's arm, and I'm just so tired of it.

Most important ingredient, other than salt?
A really high-quality extra-virgin olive oil.

Most important tool?
Sharp chef's knife.

Favorite ethnic cuisine? Excluding Italian.
Middle Eastern.

Favorite local bar?
Charlie's Kitchen. That's where my staff goes, so I get to hang out with them.

One thing you never get right in the kitchen?
Cupcakes. A disaster. On [my daughter's] birthday when she was in kindergarten, I made cupcakes, but I forgot that one of the key ingredients of frosting is butter. And it was midnight. And I didn't have butter. So I thought I'd be the clever chef and make a glaze using cream and lemon juice. She was mortified. Since then, I buy them at Lyndell's Bakery in Somerville.

Is there a silver bullet in the kitchen?
A blender. If you overcook vegetables, put 'em in a blender and call it soup! [Laughs.]

People you're most proud to have cooked for?
The Dalai Lama and Rosa Parks.

Biggest mistakes home chefs make?
They over-complicate things, they don't clean up as they go along, and they don't trust their instincts or start with what they know. And people tend to wiggle things around in the pan when they shouldn't. If you're searing something, just let it be.

Can anyone who doesn't like food be good in bed?
Wow! I never thought about it, but I think not. What a good correlation!

Thoughts on food allergies?
They are a reality for people. I do think that medically we throw a broad net and catch things we didn't, so that people are now diagnosed with a food allergy instead of it just being one of those things individuals deal with.

Biggest pet peeve as a restaurateur?
Anonymous public critique. I've always believed that the experience in a restaurant is a dialogue. The customer has as much responsibility for their experience as the restaurant. Sometimes restaurants screw up, but sometimes customers misread the menu or they were in a bad mood or had too much to drink.

Hardest thing for a home cook to get right?
Whatever you've never tried, or something you don't like or eat. I'm always amazed by people who don't eat meat and yet cook it for their families. How do you do that?

Key secret to a good cookbook?
Clear, descriptive instructions. So, not just "This is what you should do," but "If you do this, this is what it should look like."

Grossest thing you ever ate?
I've eaten worms. Testicles. Spinal cord. Eyes. Pretty much any part of a rabbit you could name.

Most exotic thing you ever ate?
Whale in Iceland. Fermented shark. They bury it, and it's just putrid. But on the delicious end, I had a 35-course meal at El Bulli [in Spain] that included things like snail eggs.

Most profitable item on the menu?
Probably bottled water.

Is food television a good or bad thing?
This is going to sound rather dramatic, but I think it's tragic. There's an opportunity to reach a huge audience with good ideas about how to cook at home, using simple, healthy ingredients and techniques, and it's completely gotten away from that. The money's in sour cream and bacon. All these people: Rachael Ray, Paula Deen, it's all butter and cream. These meals have a bazillion calories in them.

And yet you signed on for a show.
Yeah, but it's on Bravo. Top Chef Masters.

How're you going to do on it?
I'm gonna kick ass. ✖✖✖

TEN NONALCOHOLIC REASONS TO GRAB A STOOL

Four-course tasting menus serve their purpose on special occasions. But for innovative food under $20, head to the bar. We're not talking 10-cent wings and Velveeta-drenched nachos. Some of Boston's best restaurants have adapted to the times by showcasing their talents at affordable prices. Craigie on Main's pigs' tails come to mind. So do No. 9 Park's lemon corzetti. These are destination dishes, reasons in themselves to bypass the host stand and grab a stool.

THE REGULARS

FAMILIAR FACES AND THE DISHES THAT KEEP THEM SMILING

BY NICK ALTSCHULLER | PHOTOGRAPHS BY NICOLE BEGIN AND KATIE NOBLE

A BARTENDER'S HANDS ARE always working. Pulling drafts, mixing drinks, dropping checks. But when Silvertone's Michael Stevens sees you amble in, they pause, just for a second. Stevens cocks his right hand like a quarterback and then thrusts it into yours.

He might bellow a greeting, but important transmissions take place in silence. His eyebrows jump. His chin drops. The usual? With an assenting nod, a longneck slides before you, and the preamble ends. You've been tagged as a regular.

In your favorite bar, everybody doesn't know your name, just the right people do. You don't need a menu. They have your steak order memorized. You're free to venture into conversation with a stranger, and you're never more than a few stools down from an ally. "It's when you come to the watering hole, and your trough is waiting for you," explains Stevens, a veteran of many city establishments. "It's an unspoken language."

Of course, you gather over more than pints. You down oysters with family. You elbow past familiar faces for $2 tacos. Over time, the brass rail acts as a sounding board, a podium. Companions become dinner theater or captive audience.

In the beginning, the bartender entertained you with tales of good times past. Now, on the nights someone else fills your seat, there's a story about you. What follows are five accounts of regulars, plus the recipes that keep them coming back. Stevens isn't the only one in town with a few favorites.

ANCHOVIES

AS TOLD BY GENERAL MANAGER MARK KELLEHER

Having worked there for years, we all know John Areano as "Gucci," and he's definitely a presence at Anchovies. He doesn't just stop by; he punches his time card for a shift at the bar. Always entertaining, always on, everyone is on Gucci's radar, in a good way. He can chat up the director of the BSO as well as the MBTA bus driver sitting on the next stool. Genuinely interested in their days, what they have to say about what's happening in the world or what happened at the corner store, it's all good for Gucci. His current must-have is our mussels in house marinara with a basket of bread and dipping oil.

MUSSELS IN MARINARA

1	garlic clove, chopped
2 tablespoons	olive oil
½ cup	dry white wine
1 pound	mussels, cleaned
1 cup	marinara sauce

1. Sauté garlic in olive oil until translucent.
2. Add white wine and cleaned mussels. Cover until mussels begin to open.
3. Add marinara sauce and heat until mussels open completely.

ASHMONT GRILL

AS TOLD BY GENERAL MANAGER TARA O'RIORDAN

What started in the fall of 2008 as an afterschool pit stop has turned into a ritual. Every week, Jen Smith,* a third-grade teacher, makes her way to the Ashmont Grill for a short session of paper grading. The bartender sees her pull into the driveway, fixes her drink and sets it at "her" section just as she walks through the door. A little small talk about her students (maybe a little dabbing if Johnnie Walker hits a book report), and Jen gets down to work. Soon, her two friends appear. School's out, and it's on to dinner. One of her favorites is the cider-glazed pork belly. *Name changed

SLOW-ROASTED PORK BELLY WITH CIDER GLAZE

BELLY

4 pounds	pork belly, skinless
2 tablespoons	salt
1 tablespoon	brown sugar
1 teaspoon each	black peppercorn, coriander seed, fennel seed, smoked paprika

1. Blend salt, sugar and spices. Score pork fat and rub. Let sit 12 hours.
2. Roast five hours at 300 degrees, or until tender. Finish in hot oven to crisp.

GLAZE

1 quart	apple cider
2	tart apples, peeled and chopped

1. Cook cider and apples until tender. Skim off foam. Strain through chinois.

BELLA LUNA RESTAURANT AND THE MILKY WAY LOUNGE

AS TOLD BY BAR MANAGER THIAGO SOUZA

Walter Bentson is at the restaurant at least three times a week with his wife, friends or by himself. Everyone that works at Bella Luna knows him. He's more then a regular; he's our friend. He even has a stool at the bar with his name on it. Not too long ago, he comes in with his wife, Mary. As usual, Walter has a Coors Light and Mary has a Fenway (Absolut Boston, St-Germain, lemon and lime juice). Usually Walter likes to buy shots for people sitting at the bar. This night is different, though. "Thiago, do me a favor and see who's hungry." I ask a few people, and about 10 say they'd eat something. Walter then orders a round of his favorite, Pizza Menino, "light on the sauce." Yep, a round of pizza for the entire bar. I don't have to say how surprised and happy people are. And, of course, I save a slice for after my shift.

PIZZA MENINO

½ cup	Italian sausage, cooked
½ cup	pepperoni, sliced
½ cup	button mushrooms, sliced
½ cup	green peppers, sliced
½ cup	onions, sliced
1 cup	pizza sauce
2½ cups	whole-milk mozzarella cheese
14–16 ounces	pizza dough

1. Stretch the pizza dough out on a floured surface, then transfer to a pizza peel.
2. Ladle on sauce, spreading evenly around the pizza. Top with cheese and other ingredients.
3. Transfer to a 500-degree oven and bake for about 12 minutes. Results may vary depending on the oven.

ESTRAGON

AS TOLD BY BARTENDER THOMAS TIEJAN

Friday nights around 6:30 pm, you'll find Michael Cardona, a district manager with Commonwealth Wine & Spirits, Inc., occupying a coveted corner seat at the bar. Michael refers to B4 as "his seat," and he negotiates, or even resorts to minor business transactions, to boot an unknowing occupant. Once settled, a glass of Valdespino Amontillado sherry and a pringá pintxo is the standing order. He's often been Estragon's willing guinea pig, and before this dish hit the menu, our chef test-drove it on him. Who wouldn't like to end the work week with a mound of braised, sticky, marrowy goodness? Let's just hope he doesn't start calling the dish "his" pringá.

PRINGÁ PINTXO

8	good-sized marrow bones (oven-roasted for for about 30 minutes at 375 degrees)
2 pounds	beef shin meat
2 pounds	pork belly
2	cooking chorizos
2	blood sausages
2	bay leaves
1 teaspoon	cumin
	salt and pepper

1. Place the meat in a pressure cooker. Add the bay leaves, cumin, salt and pepper to taste. Once the cooker begins to whistle, cook everything for about 45 minutes.
2. Remove the marrow from the bones and mix into the meat with a potato masher. Check the seasoning.
3. When ready to serve, heat the desired amount with a bit of the cooking liquid in a pan. Serve on baguette toast.

LOCKE OBER

AS TOLD BY CHEF LYDIA SHIRE

Feb. 11 is a special night for me at Locke Ober. I receive a call that Thomas Menino is bringing his wife, Angela, and two friends to celebrate Angela's birthday. When they arrive, I immediately go out to let the mayor know we have a soup on the menu with his favorite ingredient: broccoli rabe. (We always have a little joke about rabies.) He often talks about the time, after an inauguration party, I made him a very garlicky broccoli rabe sandwich oozing with a perfect Spanish olive oil and hot red peppers. Now I make him broccoli rabe pizzas at Scampo when he's in. We've bonded over broccoli rabe, that's for sure. But no matter, the occasion is Angela's dinner. I give her a box of house-made butter crunch cookies I had just baked... the mayor's favorite.

BUTTER CRUNCH COOKIES

2½ cups	Irish butter
3½ cups	white sugar
1½ cups	light brown sugar
1 cup	confectioner's sugar
3	eggs
1 tablespoon	vanilla
3 tablespoons	corn syrup
5 cups	all-purpose flour
¼ cup	cornstarch
1½ teaspoons	baking powder
1 teaspoon	baking soda
1 teaspoon	salt

1. Melt 1 cup of butter with 2 cups of sugar in a saucepot (with a pinch of salt if the butter is unsalted). Whisk until golden and pour into a brownie pan. Place in the freezer to harden.
2. Cream together 1½ cups butter with 1½ cups sugar, the brown sugar and confectioner's sugar. Add the eggs, vanilla and corn syrup. In a separate bowl, sift together the flour, cornstarch, baking powder, baking soda and salt. Add to the creamed butter mix. Chop the hardened butter crunch and fold into the dough.
3. Mist parchment paper with cooking spray and place small balls of dough with plenty of space in between. Bake for about 9 minutes in a 350-degree oven. Let cool on wire rack. ✖✖✖

Sibling Rivalry

No Sloane Unturned The grotesque, erotic tension in Entertaining Mr. Sloane is riveting in a writhing, uncomfortable way. When aging siblings Ed and Kath spy young Mr. Sloane's healthy physique, a lecherous love triangle begins to boil, pitting brother against sister. The ménage à trois simmers as they figure out how to keep Mr. Sloane "entertained." Joe Orton's dark comedy plays at the Boston Center for the Arts through April 3. Tom Samph

Ajami ★★ ½ One of this year's Oscar nominees for best foreign language film, this collaboration between Palestinian Scandar Copti and Israeli Yaron Shani is a nerve-jangling crime drama chronicling the ways sectarian strife creeps into everything, including the underworld. As a collection of crossed wires and doomed good intentions set in the Tel Aviv suburb of Yaffa, the movie makes it clear that surviving in this neighborhood is hard enough without also having to take part in a Holy War. Ajami is broken into six overlapping chapters, each following a different protagonist on a slightly skewed timeline. But the more that's revealed, the more Copti and Shani's puzzle starts to seem gimmicky and cheap. There's a vivid sense of place, and it's impossible not to feel for these young characters, but a more straightforward telling may have granted Ajami the noble inevitability of tragedy. As is, it's merely clever. (At Kendall Square and West Newton.)

Avatar ★ ½ Twelve years and some $400 million later, James Cameron's latest opus lands with a thud. Sure, you can admire the 3-D presentation, performance-capture technique and computer animation. (If you're not already impressed enough, characters keep elbowing you in the ribs, a reminder that you're watching something amazing.) This is groundbreaking, next-level technology, and I was bored out of my damn mind. Looking like a tacky airbrush painting, Avatar is CGI eye candy by way of prog-rock album covers with an absence of characterization and an abundance of corny dialogue. Unabashedly ripping off Terrence Malick's The New World, Kevin Costner's Dances With Wolves and his own Aliens, Cameron sends Sam Worthington's crippled space marine to a distant planet to reenact a banal white-guy-saves-the-natives fantasy. It feels recycled, rehashed and more like an F/X demo reel than an actual movie. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

The Blind Side ★ The inspirational true story of the Baltimore Ravens' Michael Oher becomes one of the year's most inadvertently offensive movies, thanks to Sandra Bullock's rampaging ego and the kind of unconscious racism Hollywood does better than anyone else. Oher, the troubled son of a crack addict, spent much of his childhood homeless before being adopted by a rich, white family who kindly helped him fulfill his potential. But instead of focusing on Oher's moving struggle, The Blind Side spends two hours inviting us to worship the selflessness of his new mom, played by Bullock as an amalgamation of Julia Roberts' least appealing qualities. She fires off sassy one-liners in endless glamour shots, while the rest of the cast nods approvingly and tells us how great she is. Oher, played by Quinton Aaron, is given no thoughts of his own. He just thanks her profusely and does what he's told. This isn't a movie about adopting a son; it's about adopting a pet. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

The Book of Eli ★ ½ Essentially The Road for Dummies, directors Allen and Albert Hughes' postapocalyptic slog stars Denzel Washington as a taciturn, almost supernaturally gifted protector of the last remaining copy of the King James Bible. Hacking and slashing off limbs to spread the word of God (which I think may be missing the point), Washington keeps the Good Book from falling into the hands of nasty folk like Gary Oldman's scenery-chewing whorehouse owner. Oldman's predictably hambone performance nods to Ian McShane's immortal work in Deadwood, and it's fascinating how much the Hughes Brothers slave to replicate sequences from other movies without coming up with an original idea of their own. There's more than a little Mad Max, with certain scenes stolen outright from Children of Men. As if the constant visual references to Sergio Leone's spaghetti Westerns weren't enough, one of the characters can't stop whistling Ennio Morricone music cues. There's nothing here you haven't seen done before, and done better. (In the suburbs.)

Cop Out ★ A self-conscious throwback to crummy buddy comedies, Kevin Smith's lethargic latest doesn't have a fraction of the wit or invention of the movies it's trying to send up. Bruce Willis and Tracy Morgan star as two rogue NYPD officers on the trail of a stolen baseball card. To say there is little at stake would be a woeful understatement, and Morgan merely brays scatological non sequiturs while Willis recedes into the background, acting with his sunglasses. Smith, who carved out a career with sometimes brightly written, always poorly made, slacker comedies, is working as a

Tim Burton's well of imagination runs dry.

Alice in Wonderland ★ ½
Starring Johnny Depp, Mia Wasikowska, Helena Bonham Carter, Anne Hathaway and Crispin Glover. Screenplay by Linda Woolverton. Based on the book by Lewis Carroll. Directed by Tim Burton. At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.

Tim Burton

IT'S HARD TO REMEMBER NOW, but there was a time when Tim Burton was an original, exciting filmmaker and not just a brand name.

With films like Pee-wee's Big Adventure, Beetlejuice and Edward Scissorhands, Burton's idiosyncratic visions of alienation hit a mass-market nerve, making unlikely blockbusters out of personal parables. But his baroque dreamscapes eventually became a straitjacket. Instead of original tales, these days we endure familiar stories retold with a self-conscious, "Tim Burton" stamp of outlandish overstyling.

Alice in Wonderland was perhaps inevitable, as we've already seen his version of Charlie and the Chocolate Factory, Sweeney Todd, Sleepy Hollow and Planet of the Apes. By now, you know the drill: He takes an existing property and gussies it up with kooky production design and overindulgent performances from his wife, Helena Bonham Carter, and his other wife, Johnny Depp. The routine has calcified, and the extravagant failure of Alice in Wonderland feels like nothing more than a once-great director beating his head against the brick wall of an artistic dead end.

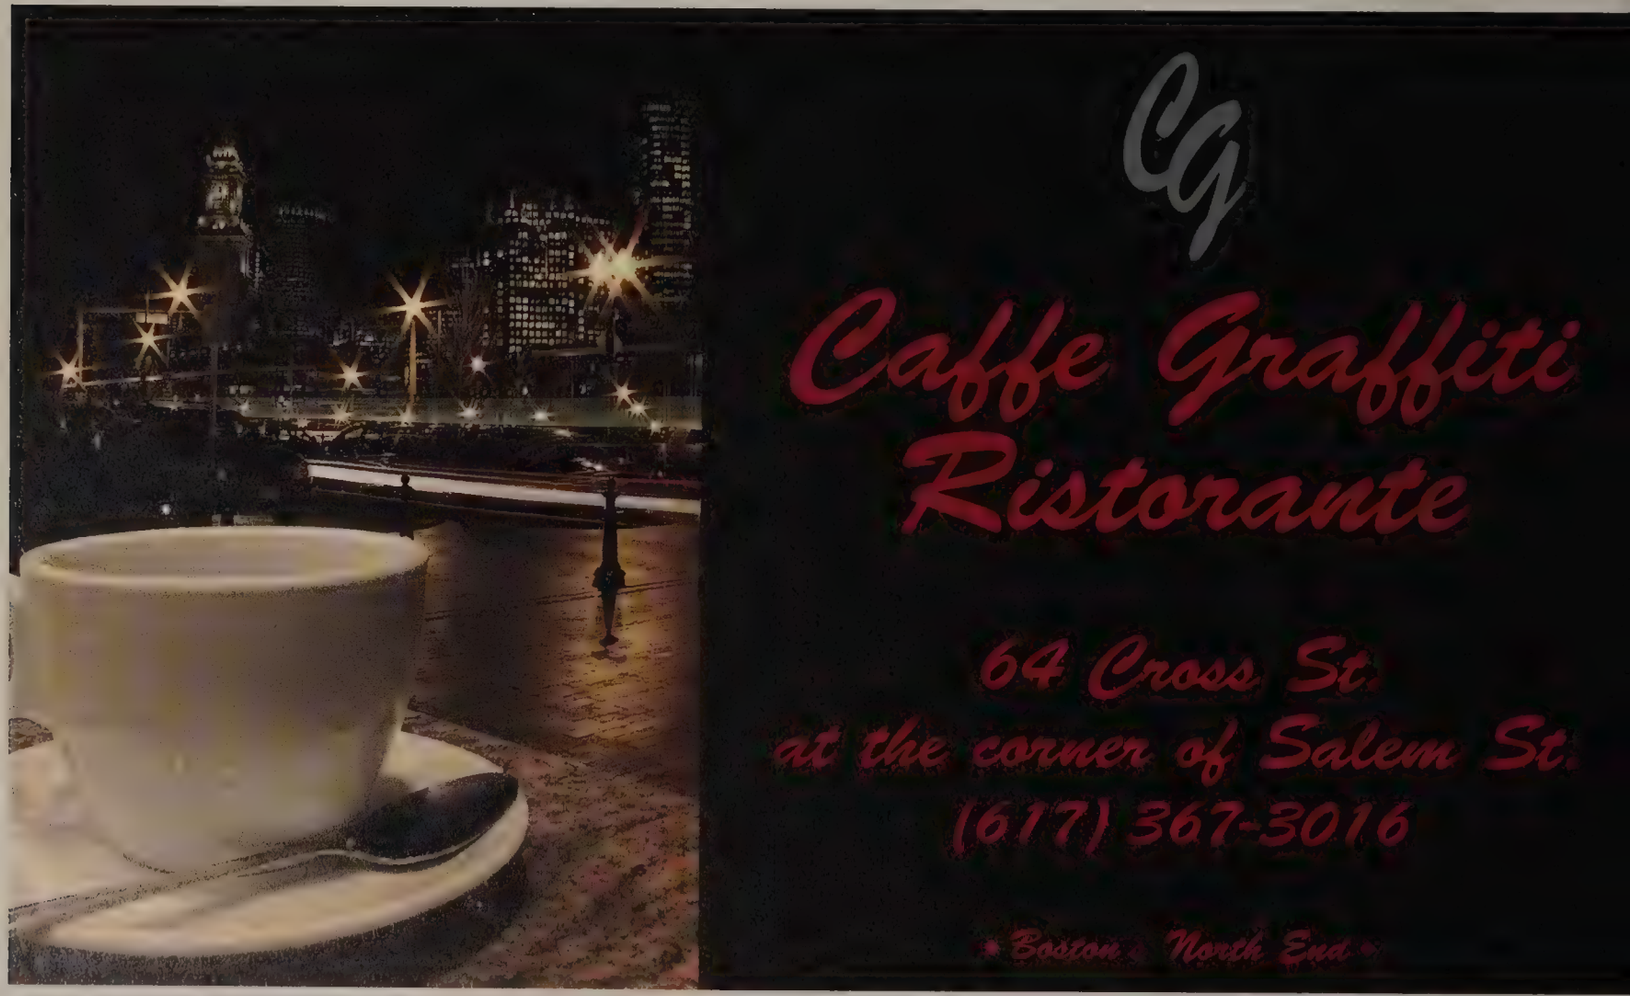
It's a joyless, empty film. Not an adaptation of Lewis Carroll's classic but a sequel, Linda Woolverton's screenplay finds a 19-year-old Alice returning to a Wonderland she can barely recognize. If this sounds familiar, that's because Steven Spielberg used the same faulty scenario for his awful Peter Pan flick, Hook. You'd think Burton would know better than to rip off one of history's biggest bombs, but you'd be wrong.

Played without a pulse by newcomer Mia Wasikowska, Alice falls back down the rabbit hole after fleeing an arranged marriage. Once arrived in the unfortunately overcast world, she encounters ugly CGI replications of her old friends the Cheshire Cat (Stephen Fry), the March Hare (Paul Whitehouse) and the Blue Caterpillar (the always droll Alan Rickman). Making the peculiar choice to ditch Carroll's sophisticated wordplay for generic, Joseph Campbell–esque mythology beats, the newfangled Alice offers variations on the same scene over and over again.

The simple act of looking at this picture is unpleasant.



On this trip, everybody recognizes Alice, but she doesn't remember them. (The place is also now called Underland, perhaps a self-satirical riff on the film's complete absence of wonder.) Things haven't gone well since Alice's last visit, and now the Red Queen rules with an iron fist, demanding beheadings on an alarmingly frequent basis. Played by Bonham Carter, who has been digitally shrunken to pint size and embellished with an enormous tulip-shaped head, the Red Queen is the only character with any discernable personality. She's a petulant child, rank with royal entitlement. It's a shrill, one-note performance, but at least it stands out.

Which is more than you can say for Depp's Mad Hatter in Michael Jackson makeup. I don't know what Depp is trying to do here, and neither, it seems, does Burton. Depp stares into space making strange pronouncements and amusing himself at the expense of the audience. The character is neither memorable nor consistent. It feels like Burton and Depp have teamed up one too many times, and their relaxed rapport has lapsed into complacency.

We get a lot of Narnia-ish talk about an ancient sword and a feisty dragon, until Alice eventually accepts her charge as "the chosen one" to save Underland from the Red Queen's tyranny. There's some more mythological mumbo-jumbo setting arbitrary rules for uninspired action sequences, and soon Burton's Alice wheezes its way into a climax indistinguishable from any CGI-heavy kid's flick.

Except this one's uglier. Burton has never had a knack for colors, and his best works lean toward black-and-white, or at least muted tones. Alice is awash in primary hues, with lurid reds and greens clashing against one another in front of barren backgrounds. The simple act of looking at this picture is unpleasant, with its dreary skies, garish palette and curiously depopulated settings.

It's worse in 3-D, as a post-production attempt to hop on Hollywood's latest trend has awkwardly retro-fit the film with a technology for which it wasn't intended. Computer-generated effects are rendered in three-dimensions, but anything that was actually photographed hangs pancake-flat in the middle distance. Has the absurd success of Avatar doomed us to years of watching movies dimmed through annoying glasses? Most blockbusters are irritating in two dimensions. Adding a third will probably kill me. ✖✖✖ director-for-hire for the first time. The result is a reminder of why filmmaker David Gordon Green once called Kevin Smith movies "a Special Olympics for Film." Cop Out is a pathetically paced inside-joke. Only Harold Faltermeyer's synth-score has the courage of its tacky convictions. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Crazy Heart ★★ ½ In his best performance since The Big Lebowski, Jeff Bridges stars as a washed-up, alcoholic country singer touring lousy Southwestern dive bars. Scott Cooper's debut feature initially boasts a grungy authenticity, but just when you think Crazy Heart is on its way to being The Wrestler of country music, a banal redemption formula kicks in and sends the whole film reeling off into inspirational-TV-movie land. The too-young Maggie Gyllenhaal proves an improbable love interest for Bridges' seedy troubadour, and (an excellent) Colin Farrell drops by as a former protégé who makes success look far too easy. The grim, admirable desolation of the film's early passages is quickly abandoned for garden-variety uplift and clichéd rehab scenes. The late-game addition of Robert Duvall as a curmudgeonly AA aficionado only adds to the phoniness. These brave performances deserved better. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Dear John ★ ½ There's something queasy about bazillion-selling author Nicholas Sparks' concept of romance. Specializing in star-crossed lovers torn asunder before they're ever forced to get down to the messy business of learning to accept one another's imperfections, his is a juvenile and troubling formula. Usually Sparks just kills one of the characters off, as in A Walk to Remember, Message in a Bottle or Nights in Rodanthe. But Dear John is even more callous. During a couple of weeks on the beach, mumble-mouthed GI Channing Tatum falls hard for Amanda Seyfried's doe-eyed friend to autistic children and horses. Soon duty calls, and the two exchange awkward, handwritten correspondence for seven years (or about six years longer than it would've taken normal people to get over a summer fling). In this effort from formerly talented director Lasse Hallström, everything just lies there martyred and inert. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Edge of Darkness ★★★ It's been eight years since Mel Gibson last played a leading role, and despite whatever qualms you may have about his occasional drunken rants, there's still nobody better at acting furious onscreen. Gibson's comeback attempt is a hard-boiled, extremely grim Boston noir that allows Mel to do what he does best. He gets really angry and either shoots people or punches them in the face. Director Martin Campbell, condensing his six-hour BBC miniseries to feature-length, has a bit of trouble retrofitting all the sprawling plot lines into an abbreviated running time, but the gist of it remains. Very bad people killed Gibson's daughter. Now he's going to make them pay. Creepy, borderline psychotic and, to put it bluntly, not aging well, Gibson is a stout, angry bulldog with a laughable Roslindale accent. He's also wicked awesome. Campbell smartly plays upon the actor's diminished good looks, short stature and air of dissolution. Mel's back, but the years have not been kind. (In the suburbs.)

An Education ★★ ½ In what's sure to be Roman Polanski's favorite film of the year, dazzling newcomer Carey Mulligan stars as a 16-year-old schoolgirl who falls under the sway of Peter Sarsgaard's suave 30-something hepcat in gloomy, postwar Britain. Adapted by novelist Nick Hornby from Lynn Barber's memoir, the movie takes a tender look back at statutory rape as a rite of passage, and it's a testament to some fine performances that the film only feels icky in retrospect. There's nobody better than Hornby at dissecting all the ways people like to define themselves through their tastes and fascinations, but in nearly every other respect, his screenplay is too fussy and neat for its own good. This is a very polite, middlebrow view of what must've actually been an extremely messy affair. Director Lone Scherfig keeps everything humming pleasantly along, with even the inevitable betrayals and recriminations occurring at a genteel pitch. It's as if all the characters are afraid to raise their voices. The feel-good final reel is almost unforgivable. (At Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Fantastic Mr. Fox ★★★ ½ Writer/director Wes Anderson's fastidious, sometimes suffocating, attention to costume detail and production design make his movies feel like they're taking place in dollhouses, so it makes sense that he would work with puppets. Rendered in hand-crafted, stop-motion animation, this marvelous adaptation of the Roald Dahl story may look like one of those Rankin-Bass holiday specials from the 1970s, but it still feels like a Wes Anderson film. It's got the filmmaker's dysfunctional family pathos and droll hipster humor, only with woodland animals instead of actors. George Clooney voices the title character, a reformed chicken-thief turned newspaper columnist itching to return to his criminal roots. His antics stoke the ire of three nasty farmers, and Mr. Fox and family find themselves on the run. Boasting bone-dry vocal turns from Meryl Streep, Jason Schwartzman and Bill Murray, the movie feels like a summation of Anderson's career thus far, with certain scenes lifted almost directly from The Royal Tenenbaums and The Life Aquatic With Steve Zissou. (In the suburbs.)

Invictus ★★★ For such a straightforward, often clumsy crowd-pleaser, Clint Eastwood's latest still feels like a marvel of restraint. Indeed, Invictus is an exercise in doing less with more. Recently elected Nelson Mandela (Morgan Freeman) seeks to reconcile a deeply divided South Africa by rallying the public behind their largely white rugby team, which had long been considered a symbol of institutionalized racism. Like Eastwood's Flags of Our Fathers, Invictus is about how cynical, insincere political calculations are often necessary to serve the greater good. Eastwood's not great at shooting sports, but he gets a sly, complicated performance out of Freeman, and there's some predictably fine, understated work from Matt Damon as the team captain. This should've been the hokiest movie ever made, but Eastwood plays it quietly and close to the vest. (In the suburbs.)

It's Complicated ★★★ There's such a lightness to Meryl Streep's work these days—even in something as wretched as Mamma Mia!—that she seems to be having the time of her life. Same goes for Alec Baldwin, whose middle-aged paunch has unleashed his inner comedian. Writer/director Nancy Meyers honestly doesn't have to do much besides put these dynamos together and let them riff. Playing a couple that's been divorced for a decade, Streep and Baldwin drunkenly hook up the night before their son's college graduation and spend the rest of the movie negotiating the horny aftershocks. Baldwin's remarried to a bitchy younger woman (Lake Bell, harshly photographed to give Streep the advantage) while Meryl finds herself in a tentative courtship with Steve Martin's sensitive architect. Like most Meyers movies, this one wallows uncomfortably in ostentatious displays of wealth. But there's no denying the giddy chemistry between Streep and Baldwin. They're both having so much fun it's contagious. (In the suburbs.)

A Prophet ★★★ ½ A best foreign-language film Oscar nominee, Jacques Audiard's entertaining gangster epic is a story about pluck and ingenuity working in all the wrong ways. Tahar Rahim stars as Malik El Djebena, a helpless young man who enters jail as an illiterate thug, only to blossom into a modern-day Michael Corleone over the span of six years. Savagely beaten on his arrival and bullied into a murder by a ruthless gang of elderly Corsicans, El Djebena quietly assimilates to prison life and works every setback to his own Machiavellian advantage. Audiard slyly comments on France's changing racial landscape, as the old-school Corsicans ruling the roost gradually find themselves outnumbered by their Arab counterparts. The diminishment of entrenched power opens up a world of opportunity for the ever-alert protagonist, and Rahim's remarkable performance expands as his character's confidence grows. El Djebena manipulates gangs and plots against one another in a cunning chess match, with amoral, crowd-pleasing results. (At Kendall Square and West Newton.)

Sherlock Holmes ★★★ ½ Folks who grew up on the tweedy elegance of Basil Rathbone's 1940s B-movies might quibble with director Guy Ritchie's presentation of Sherlock Holmes (Robert Downey Jr.) as a loutish, bare-knuckle-brawling, manic-depressive. However, I found the film to be the most pleasant surprise I've had at the theater since Star Trek. It's a jaunty, very funny picture. So often in action movies brainpower is synonymous with weakness, but the script presents intelligence as just another form of bad-assery, with Holmes using his encyclopedic knowledge of human anatomy to overcome foes twice his size. Downey and Jude Law's Watson have the easy, bristling chemistry of an old married couple, and Sherlock's only problems arrive when the screenplay keeps them apart. (In the suburbs.)

Shutter Island ★★★ ½ Martin Scorsese's latest is a work of malevolent ambience that works in spite of the occasionally lame story it's trying to tell. This is a Technicolor phantasmagoria seen almost exclusively through the point of view of its tormented, guilt-ridden antihero. Leonardo DiCaprio's federal marshal Teddy Daniels arrives on a hyperbolically forbidding island in Boston Harbor to investigate the abrupt disappearance of a mental patient at a hospital where rumors of mind-control experiments run rampant. It's an exercise in style, with a brilliant filmmaker flexing his muscles on inferior material. Scorsese telegraphs "the twist" in the opening moments, asking the audience to see the film as something scarier and more substantial than the simple narrative trick pulled in Dennis Lehane's novel. The earlier you figure out the "surprise" ending, the more rewarding the movie becomes as a portrait of denial and self-hatred. (At Boston Common, Fenway and in the suburbs.)

Jacques Audiard

Two Men and a Baby
About Race
Tahar Rahim stars in Jacques Audiard's A Prophet.

Up in the Air ★★★ ½ Director Jason Reitman's sturdy, crowd-pleasing adaptation of Walter Kirn's novel is best when it allows George Clooney to subtly toy with and deconstruct his tabloid persona. Clooney stars as a blissfully single corporate tool who spends 300 days a year flying from town to town, firing folks whenever their cowardly bosses need to outsource the axing. Streamlined, efficient and preaching a gospel of "no luggage," Clooney meets his match in Vera Farmiga's randy road warrior and finds himself forced to rethink his philosophy when Anna Kendrick's up-and-coming protégée threatens his way of life. It's slick, classy entertainment, more beholden to Billy Wilder than Judd Apatow. Reitman's occasional bouts of glibness are no match for Clooney's seemingly effortless, soul-searching work. The handsome bastard is able to suggest sudden, midlife bouts of yearning without making a big show of it. (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

Marshall's omnibus of clichés plays out like a lowlight reel of the worst parts of every romantic comedy you've hated during the past few years. Inelegantly juggling dozens of characters and disparate plotlines among a massive cast of also-rans, it's a logjam of sitcom-contrived vignettes and go-nowhere anecdotes. A lobotomized Love Actually, Valentine's Day sputters and falters for over two hours, while folks like Ashton Kutcher, George Lopez and Jessica Biel do spit-takes and pratfalls and overact so maniacally, only the relaxed, phoned-in cameo from Julia Roberts kept me from poking my eyes out. It's a horribly made movie that takes the built-in audience for granted. A friend called it "Crash, but with flowers instead of racism." (At Boston Common, Kendall Square and in the suburbs.)

The White Ribbon ★★★ Michael Haneke, the harsh, professorial director behind Funny Games and Caché, loves to punish his audience. His latest, which won the Palme D'Or at last year's Cannes Film Festival, is no exception. Filmed in high-contrast black-and-white with Haneke's usual air of viciousness and lack of music, The White Ribbon tells the sad, elliptical tale of a small pre-WWI German town infected with casual sadism. There's something reminiscent of Village of the Damned in Haneke's presentation of the town's children, tormented by their vicious, dictatorial parents until animal abuse and casual acts of torture are practically inevitable. Like his other films, there's a dazzling command of formal cinematic technique in the service of a one-note thesis. Haneke's attempting to depict Nazism in prepubescent form. The White Ribbon is a bit too easy and pleased with itself but still impossible to shake. (At Kendall Square and West Newton Cinema.)

The Wolfman ★ ½ After years of reshoots and post-production, this remake of Universal's 1941 classic has the unresolved air of a movie endlessly fussed with. Eventually finished by Honey, I Shrunk the Kids director Joe Johnston, The Wolfman can't decide what it wants to be when it grows up. Benicio Del Toro stars as the cursed son of a batty patriarch (Anthony Hopkins, doing his hammy paycheck-gig routine.) It's a dour, oppressive movie, albeit shot quite beautifully in silky shadow by cinematographer Shelly Johnson. The Wolfman just needs to be much sillier or far more serious. Hopkins, as always, gobbles up every last bit of scenery, but Del Toro sadly plays all this nonsense straight. As a producer on the film, Del Toro mustn't have wanted to sabotage his surroundings with another bizarre performance, but underplaying is not his strong suit. The film feels like a wasted opportunity. (At Boston Common and in the suburbs.)

SONIC SLALOM

Japandroids earn their mettle with maximal garage-punk tandem.

Japandroids play the Middle East Downstairs on March 31.

JAPANDROIDS AREN'T GOING to put Vancouver on the map like the Winter Olympics did. But when it comes to volatile rock from that Canadian city, Japandroids are the little engine that could, landing their 2009 album Post-Nothing on many of the year's best lists. Even the Olympics took notice, inviting the garage-punk duo to perform as part of the festivities. So what did singer/guitarist Brian King and drummer/singer Dave Prowse do? They took a pass to hit the road for Europe. "Both of us were like, 'Let's not bother being around for

[the Olympics]. This is just going to be mayhem,'" Prowse says, having just arrived home after the closing ceremonies. "We were cutting it about as close as possible. All the athletes were lined up in the airport to go off to all the different places they came from."

A few European athletes might even have come home to hear tales of merry mayhem at the hands of Japandroids, which rocked places like Germany, Poland, Denmark and Sweden. "People knew our songs, and they were singing along," Prowse says. "The crowds had fantastic energy."

That goes both ways: Japandroids are about channeling maximal energy from their two instruments. King layers clean and distorted guitar tones while Prowse lays into his cymbals and drums to fill out their rolling wash.

"Here's your punk rock back!" they bark in "Art Czars," a new 7-inch single backed with a taut cover of Big Black's "Racer X." Like that noise-rock band and its mid-'80s peers Hüsker Dü, Sonic Youth and Boston's own Mission of Burma, Japandroids relish in churning up an angular clamor that's equal parts thrash and melody.

Other influences include U.K. agit-pop outfit Mclusky and Northwest garage-punk godfathers the Sonics. "The Sonics are a huge influence, focusing on the energy and feeling of a song and playing it as hard as you can," Prowse says, "letting that energy come right off the record so you can feel it. We definitely love the way those records sound, that it's so simple and direct."

The lo-fi din of Post-Nothing wasn't necessarily an aesthetic choice, though. "We had so little time to record it and had to blaze through it as fast as possible," he says. "And it worked out incredibly well."

Prowse and King, both 27, met at college in 2000, but launched their band in 2006 after graduating. Prowse wanted to name the group Japanese Scream while King favored Pleasure Droids; they settled on Japandroids. After toying with the idea of adding a singer instead of a bass player, they honed their attack as a duo.

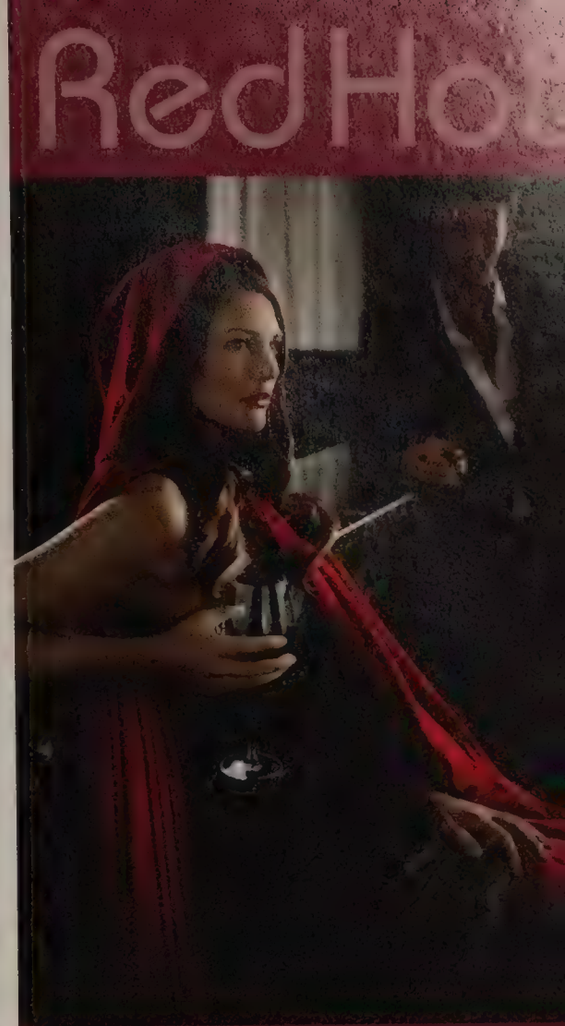
"Brian and I have a really good musical connection in terms of knowing what the other person's going to do next and being able to lock in with each other," Prowse says. "We decided it made more sense to start singing rather than find somebody who would fit with us."

> "We both love making a lot of noise."

"We both love making a lot of noise," he says. "Luckily we play as a two-piece, so we can both be as loud as we want."

Before Post-Nothing, Japandroids slugged it out in Vancouver for a few years and self-released two EPs. "It's quite isolated, and it's not a city where people look to find the next up-and-coming band—not even within Canada," Prowse says. "It's a hard place to be a musician trying to make it. A lot of musicians from Vancouver end up moving to Montreal or Toronto."

In fact, it wasn't until Japandroids played the Pop Montreal festival in 2008 that indie-label Unfamiliar signed on. "We were playing to maybe 20 people," Prowse recalls. "Now we played three shows in Poland, and each one had like 200 people. Poland?! It's totally absurd how much things have changed."



The duo has hit the road hard since King recovered from emergency surgery for a perforated ulcer in Calgary a year ago, coming to the Middle East on March 31 after two previous stops at Great Scott. "Boston's been wonderful for us, from what I can remember," Prowse says. "[Fans] have this ritual of bringing us drinks, which is really amazing, but sometimes it leads to very foggy moments." ✖✖✖

Coming Spoon

Top Drawer Spoon occupies something of a musical limbo. On the mainstream level, the group appears as a single blip on the pop radar. Yet among indie-fanatics, its members are hipster kings with guitars for scepters and shaggy locks for crowns. The quartet is on tour to promote its newest album, Transference, another example of singer Britt Daniel's unmistakable drone and the band's knack for delivering funky, danceable hooks. Catch Spoon at the House of Blues on March 27.

In Memoriam

The Improper Bostonian mourns the loss of Ray Tye, one of Boston's biggest philanthropists, Chairman Emeritus of United Liquors and President of the Ray Tye Medical Aid Foundation, who passed away on March 10th at the age of 87 after a bout with cancer. He left a widespread legacy, from the small, such as helping his friend Walter Brown, owner of the Celtics, cover payroll expenses during the lean early years of the Boston Celtics, to the immeasurable, such as paying for life-saving medical treatments for strangers he had read about in the newspapers.

"Ray Tye was a great Bostonian and an even greater source of inspiration," Mayor Thomas M. Menino said in a statement on Boston.com. "He did so much for so many, always offering help to those that needed it the most. His legacy of helping children have a better life no matter what the circumstance - whether they were from young people in Roxbury to kids in Afghanistan — will not be forgotten. Ray cannot be replaced, but we can honor him by helping those in need. He always ended every conversation with, 'What can I do for you?'"

Contributions in Ray Tye's memory may be made to the Ray Tye Medical Aid Foundation, PO Box 850376, Braintree, MA 02185

BOSTON'S BELOVED BARTENDERS

WHAT MAKES A GREAT BARTENDER?

Is it sheer Cocktail-esque flair with the bottles, an encyclopedic knowledge of potent potions, a simple willingness to go through the credit-card routine for someone with a two-drink tab? We want to know. Pick up a pen and tell us who makes the mixes, pours the pints and sets up the shots that shake and stir your unflagging adoration. Show your appreciation by voting to immortalize your favorite mixologist in our next Beloved Bartenders issue.

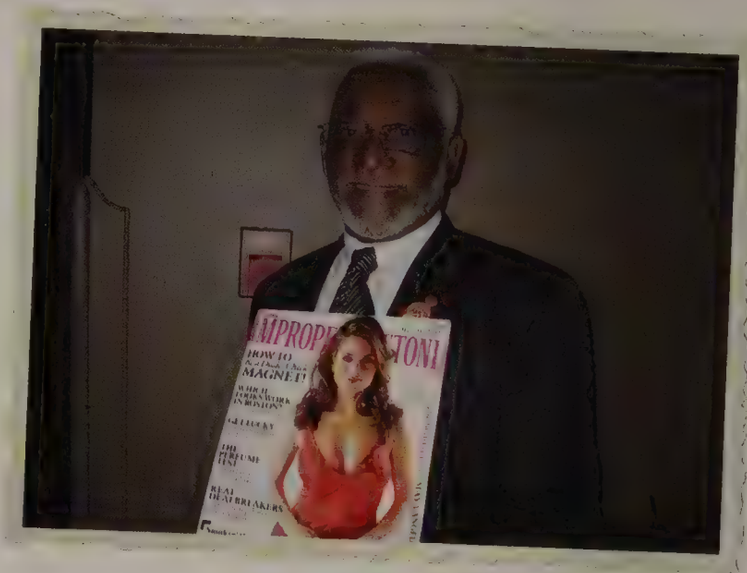
ATTENTION, BOUNTY HUNTERS! BONUS POINTS TO ANYONE WHO CAN CAPTURE AN IMPROPER READER PACKING HIS TRUNK AT THE ELEPHANT POLO TOURNAMENT, HELD MARCH 22 AT THE ANANTARA RESORT GOLDEN TRIANGLE IN THAILAND.

Unlike the rest of your friends, we want to see the photos from your next trip. Where did you take us? Send us a picture of you or a buddy, or better yet, someone famous reading THE IMPROPER BOSTONIAN and tell us where you were. The wilder your destination and the more creative your photo, the better your chances of making the cut in the esteemed IMPROPER Sightings.



Spencer, Merri and Joe Rubin and Christina Saunders visited Montego Bay, Jamaica, where it occured to them that Boston weather really sucks.

Jay Mancicocchi went to Dubai and took us to the Burj Khalifa, the world's tallest building. They say from the top floor, you can almost see to the end of Dubai's debt.

Michael Devine posed with our "Best" issue and a few locals in Afghanistan during Operation Enduring Freedom. As you can see, you gotta wear shades.

Raymond Joseph, Haiti's ambassador to the United States, enjoyed reading "The Improper." Or as it's known in Haiti, "fuel."

FRENCH CONNECTIONS

Short but Sweet

Say what you will about the liberal elite; they know how to throw a fund-raiser.

Take A Celebration of Choices, the cocktail party hosted by Planned Parenthood at the Mandarin Oriental Boston to honor longtime supporter Nina Longtine.

Among those on hand to fête her: two of the tallest people in Boston, Jack Roosevelt and Julie Hume Gordon, their respective other halves, Lacy Garcia and Phil (He Will Be Mine) Gordon, blonde bombshell Julia Owens and Beverly Hills homey Michael "Rebel" Raymo, the stunning trio of Betsy Gifford, Nancy Adams and Alexandra Wheelock, the bewitching Alexandra Dowling, Cantabridgian hipster Charley Aldrich, Beacon Hellions Andrew and Maud Cabot, their delightful cousin Carla, the Johnson sisters, Beth and Abby, Back Bay bookworm Leigh Weatherly Denny, the scrumptious Glynis Gozigian, laugh-riot Laird Elting and Catherine Steiner-Adair, who gave a speech that had everyone transfixed.

What made the evening so enjoyable, though, was its refreshing brevity—it was over by 9 pm, prompting one guest to say, "Just like my sex life: Done before bedtime."

Contest of the Month

An Improper Bostonian T-shirt goes to the first reader who correctly identifies the Chestnut Hill socialite sporting this honking-big sapphire engagement ring. Eligibility requirements include not having been a guest at either of her first two weddings and not being a member of either the Country Club or the Chilton Club, where Improper T-shirts are generally frowned upon, anyway.

Do, Re, Mi for NEC

To misquote both Shakespeare and Congreve, "Music soothes the savage beast." (Want accuracy? Read Bartlett's.) Proof positive was Le Festin de la Musique, the French-themed, black-tie, big-ticket hoo-ha held by the New England Conservatory at the Fairmont Copley Plaza, where the guestlist was solid gold and the performances, dinner and decor were worth the price of admission (which wasn't cheap and ended up netting the school a staggering $675,000).

After being adequately lubricated during the cocktail hour, guests were toasted with Taittinger and the first of the evening's musical interludes (a fanfare by Paul Dukas). Then followed a five-course feast (accompanied by the likes of Edith Piaf, Massenet and Ravel). The Chopin was a bit of a mystery (when did France take over Poland?), but dessert (a lemon cristalline) was spectacular, and the jazz and opera that finished dinner off were fing superb (pardon my French).

Like a Parisian salon, the guests were lovely to look at and delightful to know, among them: the delectable Suki de Braganza and the dashing Miguel, esteemed educator Ted Landsmark (a living piece of Boston history), Russian Bond girl Rita Rudyat, Lord of the Keyrings Marvin Gilmour (looking studly as always), French consul general Christophe Guilhou (to whom I didn't get to tell my favorite French joke), Gallic funboy Eric Jausseran, and equally sparkly others, who adjourned to the Oval Room for after-dinner dancing to the Bo Winiker Orchestra.

All in all, some enchanted evening, or as the French might put it, one helluva hootenanny.

An Affair to Remember

Trivia question: What was Lou Gehrig's wife's name? Answer: Eleanor, and by all accounts, she was quite a lady.

"I would not have traded two minutes of the joy and the grief with that man," she said, "for two decades of anything with another."

Hence the ALS Association's party, Eleanor's Affair, which was held at the Fairmont Copley Plaza and included a light buffet, a silent auction, an awards presentation and a runway show by the hotel's designer-in-residence, Denise Hajjar.

On hand were such stylistas and tastemakers as Elisha Daniels, Roberta Cohn, Jeanne Weldon, Nancy Azar, Heather DaSilva, Terri Handler and Linda Sternfelt, not to mention WCVB-TV Channel 5 anchor and the evening's emcee, Bianca de la Garza, who earns bonus points for her name and extra credit for her smoky eyes.

Guests ponied up $20 apiece for mystery bags—most contained scented candles but one had a pair of diamond earrings, which went to honoree Cindy Castro. And the award for the evening's most amusing remark went to the woman who said, "Her husband's so short, he has to jump to get an automatic urinal to flush." ✖✖✖

We have a history with The Babe, too.

Of course, the Omni Mount Washington Resort has history in general. Our grand hotel has hosted athletes, celebrities and heads of state. Our Donald Ross-designed golf course and classic tennis courts have been played by some famous names as well (Babe was the Sultan of more than one Swat). And our thrilling canopy tour and legendary skiing capture the natural grandeur of the White Mountains. Share in our legacy with a visit to the Omni Mount Washington Resort.

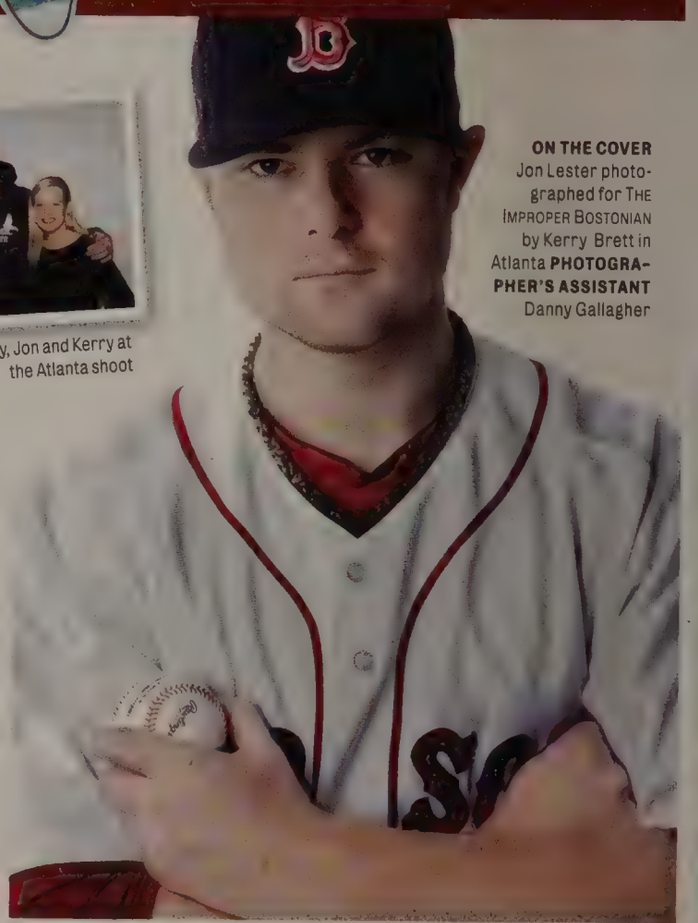
Second Chances

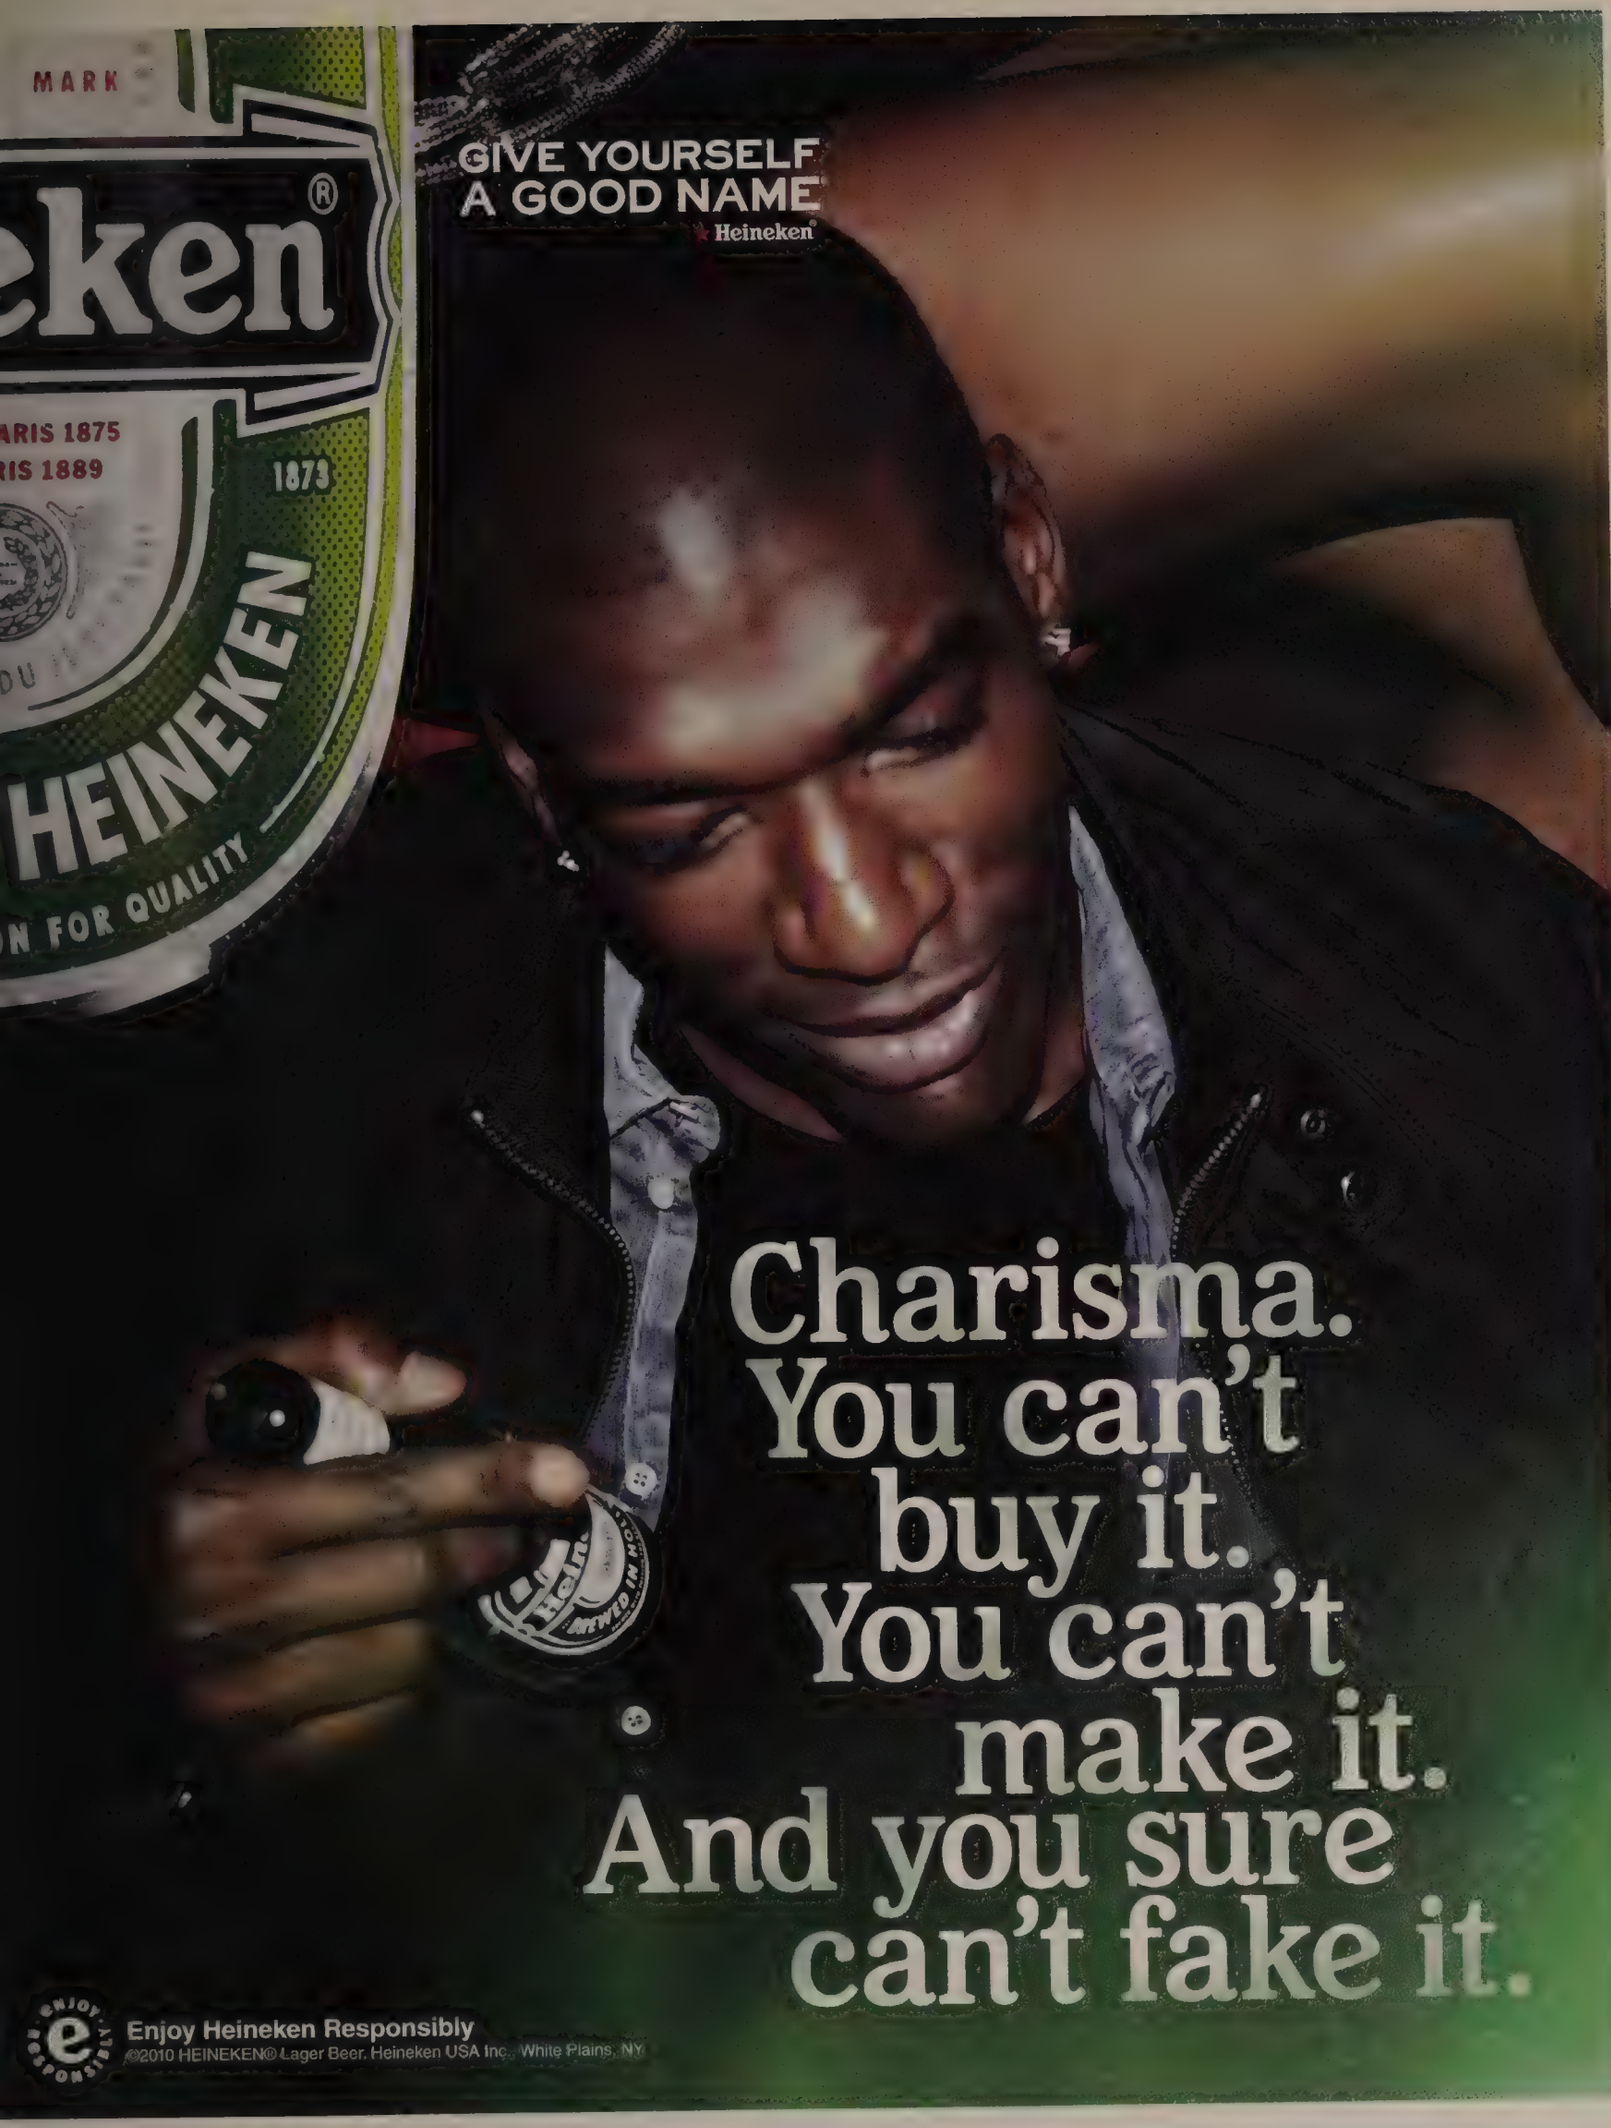
Professional sports are a soap opera, brimming with tales of personal failure and redemption. Tiger Woods, with his lurid sex scandal, is the man of the moment. Over the past months his affairs have made ESPN The Magazine read like US Weekly, but the story is only half-written. Players always get second chances, and Woods is no exception.

When it happens, his inevitable comeback won't feel especially wholesome. In the anthology of athletes, Woods is now a devil to someone like Jon Lester's angel. Lester's return to the field after battling lymphoma felt like a true celebration. Today, he's cancer-free and perhaps the best pitcher the Red Sox have.

Danny, Jon and Kerry at the Atlanta shoot



We celebrate Lester on our cover this issue, while recognizing that a team consists of many players. For the full picture on the season ahead, Ezra Dyer turned to Sons of Sam Horn, a message board powered by baseball's biggest fans. Only time will tell if they picked the right characters to watch (Dice-K, Clay Buchholz), but some drama is a given.



Here's hoping for a happy ending.
